The Company has been formed to acquire and work mining rights over a property known as the Bisichi Valley Tin Area, approximately three square miles in extent, situated in the Bauchi Tin Fields of Northern Nigeria. A report on the property, dated August 18, 1910, has been made, under the direction of the Niger Company, Limited, by Mr. Laws and the following statements are for the most part based on this report.

The Bisichi Valley area is about 12 miles south-east of Jos, at the head waters of the River Gongola, on the main transport route from Kefli to Naraguta, and Mr. Law estimates that under present circumstances tin could reach the Liverpool market in 33 days after leaving the company's mines and, as facilities improve, this time will be substantially reduced.

The property lies in a natural basin at the foot of a range of hills and is traversed from west to east by the Bisichi or Shen River, which has an excellent waterfall at the western end of the property and falls rapidly towards the east. There are two smaller streams flowing in from the north which have also good waterfalls. Mr. Laws states:—"One of the most pleasing features of this property is its constant supply of water for sluicing and power purposes and the ample head of water given by the three falls for hydraulicing."

Systematic tests by trial pits were commenced early this year and up to the present the great proportion of the alluvium of the River Bisichi has been tested. The tested area averages four yards in depth and contains approximately 2,120,000 cubic yards of payable alluvial wash, varying in value from traces to 129 lb. of black tin per cubic yard, the average value being 7·27lb. of black tin per cubic yard. The total contents of the tested portion therefore amounts to 6,800 tons, exclusive of the river bed deposits, which the Niger Company's engineers estimate to contain about 1,000 tons. Mr. Laws, judging by actual returns from similar deposits on the field, considers this estimate of 1,000 tons a moderate one and states that it may be taken that some 7,800 tons of black tin (containing over 70 per cent. of pure metal) has been developed to date. Taking the costs as estimated by Mr. Laws at £15 per ton, the tonnage contained in the area already proved shows an available profit of over £350,000, or £45 per ton. Mr. Laws arrives at this figure by taking the price of black tin in the market at Liverpool at £90 per ton and allowing £15 per ton for working expenses and £30 per ton for transport and contingencies. The ground already tested represents about one-tenth of the total area, but payable tin-bearing alluvium of a lower grade also exists on other portions of the Bisichi Valley area.

Mr. Laws advises the immediate erection of an hydraulicing plant, capable of dealing efficiently with wash dirt sufficient to produce 800 tons of black tin annually, an ample head of water being available for this purpose throughout the year, and, providing no unforeseen difficulties arise, he is of opinion that the whole of the plant would be in operation within nine months.

The working capital provided amounts to £50,000, which in Mr. Law's opinion, will be amply sufficient. He suggests, indeed, that it would leave a surplus should the directors think it advisable to extend the area or acquire property in the locality.

In conclusion, Mr. Laws states: "I consider the Bisichi Valley a very valuable property and one that can hardly fail to be successful."

The price to be paid by the company for the property is £150,000, to be satisfied as to £143,000 in shares of £1 each in the capital of the company, credited as fully paid up, and as to £7,000 in cash.

BANKS and "BANKS."

Recent "Bank" Failures.
IMPORTANT PUBLIC NOTICE.

The recent suspensions and failures of a number of Financial Institutions calling themselves "Banks" emphasise the importance of a proposal made by Mr. Thomas Farrow, Author of the "Moneylender Unmasked," "In the Moneylender's Clutches," "Shylock at the Bar," and other works which produced the famous Inquiry by the House of Commons Select Committee on Moneylending, and the subsequent Act of Parliament regulating the practices of Moneylenders.

Mr. Farrow opened the Inquiry by giving six days' evidence, and on Thursday, 3rd June, 1897, proposed:—

"THAT MONEYLENDERS SHOULD BE COMPELLED TO TRADE IN THEIR OWN NAMES WHEREVER THEY CARRIED ON BUSINESS, AND THAT THEY SHOULD BE PROHIBITED FROM USING THE TERM 'BANK,' OR ANY OTHER MISLEADING TITLE."

The Bank which Mr. Farrow founded in 1904, Farrow's Bank, Limited, The People's Bank, and of which he is Chairman and Managing Director, was framed upon the model of the famous People's Banks of the Continent, which have proved great commercial, economic, and social successes.

They have stood the test of long experience, provided a safe and remunerative depository for the people's savings, built up struggling businesses, saved the homes of the people from ruin, crushed the power of usurers, and restored the industrial and working classes to positions of prosperity, freedom, and independence.

So great is the confidence in these Banks that in times of war and panic the investing public have withdrawn their money from Government and other State controlled Banks, and placed it in the People's Banks.

In Farrow's, therefore, there is a genuine Joint Stock Banking Organisation with a share capital of £500,000; a Bank paying reasonable dividends and fair interest to its many thousands of shareholders, depositors, and current account customers, an Institution based upon experience and standing for a profound principle; a People's Bank, conducted by the People for the benefit of the People; and an impregnable Fortress which shall be regarded for all time as a monument of Solidity, Stability, and Safety.

Readers would do well to possess themselves of a copy of the Bank's official publications and Annual Report and Balance Sheet, which can be had on application at the Head Office, 1, Cheapside, E.C. (Opposite the General Post Office), and at the various Branches throughout the United Kingdom.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE NO. 1,654.

It is now a considerable while since we have had a "Parody" Competition in these columns. So I think the time has come round for giving those of my readers who are experts at this sort of thing a chance of proving their capacity.

I am therefore offering this week the usual Prize of Two Guineas for

THE BEST PARODY OF KEATS' WELL-KNOWN SONNET, ENTITLED "ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER."

For the benefit of those of my competitors who may not have a Keats handy, I quote the sonnet herewith:—

Much have I travelled in the realms of gold
And many goodly States and Kingdoms seen;
Round many western islands have I been
Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold.
Oft of one wide expanse have I been told
That deep-browed Homer ruled as his demesne;
Yet never did I breathe its pure serene
Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold;
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken,
Or like stout Cortez, when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific—and all his men
Looked at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent upon a peak in Darien.

I would remind competitors, as I have done before on similar occasions, that the essence of a good parody is to preserve the sound of the original as far as possible, while departing from it as widely as possible in sense.

Obviously, the parody must be in the nature of a burlesque, and if it can be made to deal with some topic of current interest, so much the better.

I have only to add that no competitor may submit more than one parody, and that all parodies must reach TRUTH Office not later than by the first post on Monday, November 7.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,646.

BEST SUGGESTION FOR A SUITABLE LONDON MEMORIAL TO OUR LATE KING, EDWARD VII.

The Prize of Two Guineas in this Competition is awarded to RIAM. RIAM'S suggestion was as follows:—

"In view of the late King Edward's interest in hospitals, it is suggested that a suitable memorial would be a permanently endowed ward in each of the large London hospitals, to be known as the 'King Edward the Seventh Ward.' Any surplus funds to be employed in paying off the existing debts of those hospitals."

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,647.

A LIST OF THE SIX MOST EXPRESSIVELY ONOMATOPŒIC WORDS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The "ideal" list produced by collating all lists sent in works out as follows:—

Hum, buzz, quack, hiss, fizz, with splash and swish bracketed for last place.

No competitor has succeeded in giving all correctly.

The Prize of Two Guineas, therefore, is equally divided between VENI, MIRANDA, CLIO, TROT, H. WYNOTTE, NYMPH, and ALMA, each of whom gave four correctly.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,648.

TO SELECT, IN ORDER OF MERIT, THE THREE BEST STORIES IN THE SIXTEENTH SERIES OF "QUEER STORIES FROM TRUTH."

The "ideal" list of three, arrived at by collating all lists sent in, works out as follows:—

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,651.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

TOPICAL SONGS OF A HUMOROUS CHARACTER DEALING WITH SOME SUBJECT OF UP-TO-DATE INTEREST.

"THEY'LL NEVER STOP AT THAT."

Now the Suffragettes are calling "Every woman wants a vote,"
But it's pretty sure they'll never stop at that;
For their leaders' latest speeches unmistakably denote
They are quite determin'd not to stop at that.
In the not-far-distant future we most probably shall see
That from every household duty all the married women flee,
Leaving each her wretched husband with the babies on his knee—
And they wouldn't—but for Nature—stop at that.

Chorus.

For happen what will, they will never stand still,
But continue the country to bore;
There isn't a doubt they'll continue to shout,
And ceaselessly clamour for more.

Now the Socialists are calling, "Get the taxes from the land!"
And, indeed, they own they will not stop at that;
From their pamphlets and their speeches we may clearly understand
They will never for a moment stop at that.
For the challenge has been issued, and the gauntlet has been thrown,
And the doctrine they are preaching is quite openly made known:
"What is yours is mine henceforward, altho' what is mine's my own"—
And it's doubtful if they'll even stop at that.

Now, the Kaiser William's calling, loud and even louder still—
And it's probable he will not stop at that—
"Who defies the Lord's anointed it is only right to kill"—
If, indeed, he's satisfied to stop at that.
His opinion of his merits 'tis impossible to mar
And he's openly declaring, to the nations near and far,
That himself and the Almighty are quite nearly on a par,
And he will not, for much longer, stop at that!

Ballantrae.

THERE'S NOTHING LIKE RUBBER.

Now, Rubber is "capital" stuff to-day—
It's going well and strong—
You've only to buy the shares that pay
And your fortune's made ere long!

I saw new companies advertised
To yield untold per cent.;
To invest at once a friend I advised,
For at least it would pay his rent!
So to the bank he sped,
And this is what he said:

Chorus.

"Some Rubber shares for me!
Though oil and fancy wood,
Mines, rice, cocoanuts, and tea
May be just as good,
Don't delay—lists close to-day—
Take my £ s. d.
'Bulls' or 'bears,' I must have shares
In a rubber company!"

Big crowds were waiting outside the bank doors
And he could not get near;
So he stood in the queue, lined up in fours,
Through the hottest day this year.
He waited his turn: there were just two more,
Then he'd be in the place,
As he mounted the step their clock struck four,
And the doors were slammed in his face!
Like rubber wild, out-side
Unto the clerks he cried:

Chorus.

"Some rubber shares for me!" etc.

Chaffcutter.

I often wonder how so many people can contrive
To keep the public interest in their little selves alive;
Keir Hardie and his comrades, for example, fill the air
With all they mean to do and with the projects they prepare.

Chorus.

And it really matters an awful lot
What sort of a giddy show they've got.
If you doubt it you oughtn't;
It's very important—
It matters an awfully wonderful lot.

Then take the famous Suffragettes: they'll start a new campaign,
And run themselves for all they're worth—to gaol and out again.
They're very energetic, and they're always on the go:
Advertisement is what they want to give their cause a FLOA.

Now, when the next election comes, as come it will some day,
The question of our tariff will be settled either way;
Some Government will be in power to rule or wreck the State.
It doesn't matter what you think, they'll think themselves first rate.

King Manuel of Portugal has reached the British shore;
His country doesn't want him in its bosom any more.
They've had enough of royalties, and want a cheaper thing,
And shout for a republic and the blessings it will bring.

Now you and I and all of us who write these little songs
Will (all but one) be losers, and may ventilate our wrongs.
Some of the poor competitors may not appear in print
Unless the Puzzle Editor will take this as a hint.

Lugh.

AVIATION.

The times are changed since coaching days,
When highwaymen took life or purse.
The motorist for speed now pays,
And thinks policemen rather worse.

Chorus.

Times move, and men don't now stagnate,
But learn birds' flight to imitate;
And home-made wings with pride inflate,
To show how man can aviate!

No more in solitary state
Now dwells unknown "The man in moon,"
Since men from earth who aviate
May call on any afternoon.

Some men still love their motor-cars,
And so prefer on earth to crawl;
Others would aviate to Mars,
And nothing fear except a fall!

Prepare your telescopes to view
The coming of the men from Mars
And man from moon, like bolt from blue,
Returning calls from earth to stars.

Now, aviation is all right
When safely watching flights in air;
But, skied aloft in corner tight,
We'd wish we'd never flown up there!

Bel Demonio.

The Lima Light Power and Tramways Company (Las Empresas Electricas Asociadas) has recently been formed to take over and work, with the approval of the Supreme Government and the Municipalities, the following five Electric Railway, Tramway, Water-power and Lighting Undertakings, and the Lease of the Lima Railway Company, Limited.

FERRO-CARRIL URBANO DE LIMA.—An Electric Tramway, of about 33 kilometres of single track, running through the principal streets of Lima, the Capital of Peru, and working under a Concession from the Municipality of Lima for 60 years from April, 1905. The number of passengers carried during the year 1909 was 16,708,802.

TRANVIA ELECTRICO DE LIMA Y CHORILLOS.—A Light Electric Railway, of about 26 kilometres of single track, running in conjunction with the above-mentioned Urban Tramway, and connecting the City and its suburbs, Miraflores and Barranco, with the seaside resort of Chorrillos, and working under a Concession from the Supreme Government for 66 years from 1903. This railway, serving as it does the residential suburbs of Lima, is used daily by passengers journeying to and from the City, and the number of passengers carried during the year 1909 was 2,888,721.

FERRO-CARRIL ELECTRICO DE LIMA Y CALLOA.—A Light Electric Railway, of about 30 kilometres of single track, which connects Lima with Callao, the principal Port of the country, serving also the town of Callao and its suburb, La Punta, and is being worked under two Concessions, one from the Supreme Government, and the other from the Callao Council, both granted in the year 1903 for a term of 66 years. The number of passengers carried during the year 1909 was 3,211,560.

COMPANIA NACIONAL DE TRANVIA ELECTRICO.—A Tramway which was built to compete with the Tranvia Electrico de Lima y Chorrillos, at a cost of about £200,000, and was recently acquired by the Empresas Electricas Asociadas on favourable terms. The number of passengers carried during the ten months of the year 1909 while the line was working was about 706,000.

EMPRESA ELECTRICA DE SANTA ROSA. The Power Stations which supply the electric current required for the tramways, railways, lighting, and power of Lima, Callao, and Chorrillos and their suburbs, working under three Concessions, granted by the Supreme Government, two in perpetuity, and the third for 50 years from the year 1900. The plant is capable of producing 13,000 h.p. driven by water, and 3,000 h.p. worked by steam. The steam plant is seldom used, but is held in reserve.

THE LIMA RAILWAY CO., LTD.—This English Railway Company was leased to the Undertaking in 1907 as regards the line from Lima to Chorrillos for a period of 30 years, and as regards its remaining lines for a period of 45 years, and the lease contract has been taken over by the new Company.

These Companies, with the exception of the Compañia Nacional de Tranvia Electrico and the Lima Railway Company, have been managed since 1906 by a Company also called Las Empresas Electricas Asociadas.

In order to secure the present issue of Debentures by one consolidated mortgage upon the combined properties constituting the Undertaking, instead of by separate mortgages upon the different Undertakings, the five first above-named Companies have been dissolved, and their Properties and Concessions, together with the Lease of the Lima Railway, have been transferred to the present Company.

The new Company owns all the cars and modern equipment used in the conduct of its business, while its hydro-electric power plant is of modern construction and conveniently situated for the economical production of current.

The new Company also owns the only existing Installations in Lima for Electric Light and Power, and supplies the private lighting of Lima, Callao, Chorrillos, and their Suburbs, and has, moreover, a Contract for the public lighting of the City of Lima up to 1912.

The Lima Gas Company, which is the only existing competitor for public or private lighting, is controlled by the new Company through ownership of a majority of its Share Capital.

The present issue is made with the primary object of paying off various Bonds, loans and obligations outstanding, amounting in the aggregate to about £970,000, and also providing further sums for the improvement and extension of the Undertaking of the Company.

A full Report upon the property, from which the above particulars have been mainly taken, was made on the 31st December, 1909, by Mr. W. L. Morkill, the General Manager of the Peruvian Corporation, Ltd., who has had large experience in railways in Peru and Mexico, and a Report was also made by Senor Oleachea, an eminent Peruvian Lawyer, on the Titles to the properties, and these Titles have also been examined and approved by a second eminent Peruvian Lawyer, Sgr. J. Ortiz de Zevallos.

The profits of the Undertaking for the last three years are shown in the following Certificate of Messrs. Price, Waterhouse, and Co., addressed to Messrs. J. Henry Schröder and Co., and dated September 16th, 1910:—

| 1907. | 1908. | 1909. |
| £155,362. | £182,390. | £153,470. |

"We report that we have attended at Lima, and have examined the Books of the Companies comprised in the Empresas Electricas Asociadas for the three years ended 31st December, 1909. We find that the profits earned, after deducting the working expenses, including charges for renewals and repairs, but not including depreciation, Managing Directors' salary or Directors fees, were as stated above

"(Sgd.) PRICE, WATERHOUSE AND CO."

The amount required annually for the Interest and a Sinking Fund sufficient to redeem the Debentures within 25 years will be £88,898.

The Accounts furnished by the Company for the half-year ended 30th June, 1910, show an increase in net revenue of £5,876 over the corresponding period of the previous year. This increase is to some extent accounted for by the cessation of competition from the Compañia Nacional de Tranvia Electrico, recently purchased by the Company, and also by the general improvement in the trade of the country. It is, therefore, expected that the receipts for the current year will show a considerable increase in comparison with those of last year.

The Company has an authorised share capital of £1,500,003, in £1 shares, of which £1,350,003 are outstanding and fully paid. Of these shares, three have been specially created, and will be allotted to the Trustees for the Debenture-holders. The other shares give one vote per share, but these three shares confer a right to 800,000 votes, and, during the whole period of the currency of the Debentures of the present issue, the Trustees will have the right to appoint eight members of the Board of Directors which is limited to 15 Directors by the Bye-laws of the Company.

Four of the Directors appointed by the Trustees for the Debenture-holders are resident in London, and one in Paris, but provision is made in the Bye-laws of the Company for these Directors to be represented at Board Meetings, and for ensuring that no resolutions can be passed at General Meetings of Shareholders without the holders of these three shares being present in person or by proxy or having at least 44 days' notice of the Meetings.

Copies of the Reports of Messrs. Price, Waterhouse, and Co., Morkill, Oleachea, and J. Ortiz de Zevallos, and copies of the Company's Bye-laws and Reports for the years 1906 to 1909, and a copy of the draft Trust Deed, may be seen at the offices of Messrs. Slaughter and May, 18, Austin Friars, London, E.C., during the usual office hours at any time whilst the List is open.

Application will be made for quotations on the London Stock Exchange and the Brussels Bourse.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from Messrs. J. Henry Schröder and Co., 145, Leadenhall Street, London, E.C., and from Messrs. W. Greenwell and Co., 2, Finch Lane, London, E.C.

The property is being acquired from the Niger Company, Limited. It consists of an alluvial area of 785 acres, with a width of 400 yards, through which flows, for a distance of 5¼ miles, a stream having its source on the tin-lode property referred to below. This stream flows into the adjoining property of the Naraguta Company.

Sketch Plan by Mr H W Laws. M.I.M.M. Chief Mining Engineer of the Niger Co Ltd showing position of the Company's Mining Lease and Alluvial Area in the Bauchi District of Nigeria.

This company has by its first eight months' work provided (without elaborate machinery) 305 tons of tin concentrates, the last shipment of which realised £112 per ton, equal to £163 per ton of metallic tin.

As will be seen from the map, the Gel property is also in close contiguity to the Jos, controlled by another group, by whom several excellent reports have been received, and upon which development work is proceeding.

Mr. H. W. Laws, M.I.M.M., the Chief Mining Engineer of the Niger Company, reports upon the alluvial area of 785 acres:—

"The bed of the stream is extremely rich in tin—in fact, it is one of the richest in the country. The nature of the deposit does not admit of accurate measurement and sampling, but an idea of its value has been gained by the employment of tributors, who worked the gravels by hand, using calabashes for separating the ore. By this primitive method and with no supervision 50 persons can win ten tons of black tin per month at a cost (including cleaning and bagging) of less than £10 per ton. This rate of work can proceed for eight months of the year, and a slightly lesser rate for the four wettest months. With labour available there is no reason why a larger number of people should not be employed. The output could be supplemented by ground-sluicing the banks at certain seasons of the year."

In addition to this alluvial property the Gel Company is acquiring a half share in the option to purchase a lode formation which covers 640 acres. Upon this lode the Niger Company have already spent a large sum in prospecting with very satisfactory results. A lode formation of a width of 20 feet has been exposed, and an analysis of a four-foot section gave 20 per cent. of tin.

Mr. Laws reports:—With regard to this property, "A total of 27 tons of black tin was won from the surface of the Gel lode area and from the beds of the stream during three months of last year." This amount was obtained while prospecting.

Work will be started by the new Company immediately, and it is proposed to sink a shaft when an engineer of Australian experience, who has been engaged, arrives on the property.

This statement is issued for public information. Further particulars with regard to the property can be obtained upon application at the Company's offices.

ENTRE NOUS.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made for the Truth Doll and Toy Show to be held at the Royal Albert Hall, as usual, on Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15. On p. 1085 of this issue will be found a full account of what the Truth Toy Fund is and what it has to do, for the benefit of all readers who require detailed information on the subject. It will be enough, therefore, to mention here the gist of the whole matter, namely, that upwards of £1,000 will be required to pay for the dolls and toys, and a further £250 for the "Tress Barry" sixpences, the distribution of which I feel sure my readers will desire to continue. As experience shows that appeals for this purpose fall flat if issued at too early a date, I have put it off this year as late as possible. When it is understood that £1,250 has to be raised, and that this ought to be done in the course of the next four weeks, I trust that the response will be general and prompt.

With regard to the unclothed dolls on whose behalf I have been deeply concerned for some time past, I am truly thankful to say that various kind-hearted ladies have now relieved me of the greater part of them. But a hundred or so of the small dolls are still shivering in the mere apology for clothing in which their makers send them out into the world, and they ought to be in the hands of the modistes soon if they are to appear in public on December 14. I have also a few large and a few "natural" dolls still on my hands. The case of a natural doll in a state of nudity seems to me to make an irresistible appeal to the charitable; and I may add that these poor creatures—I suppose to make their condition the more natural—are put upon the market absolutely in a state of nature. I should be very glad if I could awaken interest in them.

Speaking of my dolls last week, I referred to the loss which they have sustained through a lady "who, for several years, has annually dressed at least 500 dolls for the Truth Show being this year unable to continue her work." I am sorry that, through not verifying my references, I did very much less than justice to the lady in question. In recent years she has dressed 1,000 dolls annually. It is no wonder, therefore, that her place has been difficult to fill.

There is no idea of the Court paying frequent visits to Holyrood House, as has been asserted, and the story of this arrangement having been discussed during Lord Rosebery's recent visit to Balmoral is merely an ingenious invention. Holyrood is an impossible place as a Court rendezvous, except for two or three days, for obvious reasons. Nothing can be worse than the situation and surroundings of the palace, and the interior is not arranged for residence. No doubt the plan followed by King Edward when he visited Edinburgh some years ago will be adopted by King George. Holyrood was used for entertainments and State ceremonials, but the King and Queen resided during the week at Dalkeith Palace, which was placed at their disposal by the Duke of Buccleuch. The use of a country house easily accessible could always be obtained on the occasion of a Royal visit to Edinburgh.

Queen Alexandra will not need to travel into Austria in order to meet her sister, the Duchess of Cumberland, as Her Royal Highness and the Duke have arrived at Copenhagen for a short stay. Queen Alexandra and Princess Victoria are to leave Copenhagen on Friday morning for Cologne, whence they will travel to Calais by way of Brussels, arriving in London (Victoria Station) on Saturday night. The Queen of Norway and the Crown Prince Olaf will travel to England with Queen Alexandra, who is to stay in town for a few days before going to Sandringham, and it is expected that Her Majesty will next week pay a visit to the Royal vault at Windsor Castle.

It is generally reported in Court and diplomatic circles, both at home and abroad, that Queen Alexandra is anxious for King George to sanction a new code of precedence, which would place her on an official equality with the Queen Consort. This is an unheard-of arrangement in Western Europe, but it exists in Russia, where the Empress Mother is legally the most powerful member of the Imperial Family after the Tsar himself. It may be hoped that no such change will be carried out in this country, as the Russian system has worked very badly indeed, leading to constant tracasseries and every kind of public and private complication. The report has been circulated all over Europe, and it has caused much gossip at foreign Courts.

A weekly journal was quite wrong in announcing that, as a descendant of George the Third, Prince Francis of Teck "had a right" to be buried in the Royal vault at Windsor. Under no circumstances has any member of the Royal family any "right" in the matter of his or her burial, for the place is absolutely at the pleasure of the Sovereign. Moreover, Prince Francis of Teck was officially a member of the Royal family of Wurtemberg. When an English Princess marries a foreign Royalty her children, of course, belong (de jure) to the house of her husband.

The "tombhouse" of George the Third, under the Wolsey or Albert Memorial Chapel, is not the only Royal vault at Windsor. There is an ancient Royal burial place underneath the choir of St. George's Chapel, where, among others, Henry VIII. and Charles I. lie. There is also the so-called Gloucester vault, which was bricked up early in the reign of Queen Victoria after the funeral of Princess Sophia Matilda.

Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein, who has been staying in England for several months, left Cumberland Lodge on Saturday for Berlin.

The Queen of Norway will reside at Appleton House for between five and six weeks. King Haakon will come to England early in December, and their Majesties are to pay a visit to the King and Queen at Windsor Castle before they leave London for Christiania about Tuesday, December 20.

The Duchess of Sparta has arrived at Friedrichshof on a visit to Prince and Princess Frederick Charles of Hesse from Bonn, where she has been the guest of Prince and Princess Adolphus of Schaumburg-Lippe for a month. The Duchess of Sparta is to pay a visit later on to the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Baden at Carlsruhe, and she will also be the guest of Princess Louis of Battenberg at the Chateau of Heiligenberg for a week, and of the Dowager Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha at Coburg.

Some of the papers continue to publish the most absurd trash about King Manuel, which is only to be noticed because it is as mischievous as it is idiotic and baseless. We are told that King George went to Wood Norton because King Manuel desired his advice, and this is dished up with a tale about the formation of a foreign legion on behalf of the Throne of Portugal, which British soldiers are to be encouraged to enter. Of course, this is all a farrago of fictions. King George and Queen Mary went to Wood Norton simply as a matter of courtesy and kindness, and their visit had no connection whatever with public affairs in Portugal—either past, present, or future. There is no more prospect of a Royal restoration in Portugal than in France. King Manuel had better arrange his private affairs as soon as possible, after which his best course will be to start on a two years' journey round the world. It is a pity that some gobemouches have tried to get up a fuss about the significance of King George's visit to Wood Norton, in view of "the present movement in diplomatic circles." There is no "movement" of any sort or kind in connection with Portugal in any diplomatic circles anywhere, and the "significance" of King George's visit is simply 0 0 0 . King Manuel should be advised by his friends to accept his exile with the same philosophic indifference which was displayed by the Orleans Princes.

The Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin have been staying in Denmark on a visit to the Crown Prince and Crown Princess at the Chateau of Sörgenfri, and they were also the guests for a few days of the King and Queen at Fredensborg. The Crown Princess of Denmark is the elder sister of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and the Grand Duchess is the second daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland.

The Comtesse de Flandre has left the Villa Haslihorn, her place near Lucerne, for the season, and she is staying for a short time at Ouchy before returning to Belgium. The Dowager Grand Duchess of Baden (Princess Louise of Prussia) has also been staying at Ouchy, having proceeded thither on leaving the chateau on the island of Mainau, near Constance. It is very likely that the Grand Duchess Louise will go to Italy for the winter with her daughter the Queen of Sweden.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

In Dublin last week speech-making went on with increasing assiduity day after day. Discourses were delivered in a great many different places on an infinite variety of subjects, philanthropic, philosophic, literary, theatrical, polemical. Amongst the speakers were the Chief Secretary, Mr. Hilaire Belloc, Mr. Martin Harvey, Mr. Justice Madden, Lord Donoughmore, Mr. Brunskill, Mr. Justice Ross, Lady Gregory. Many bishops spoke during the week, and then we had, for the first time in Ireland, Tetrazzini. As an inveterate punster said, "The 'ayes and the noes,' in eternal rivalry, are constantly with us, but the ears had it all their own way last week." There was certainly a great deal to be listened to, and fortunately much that was worth listening to.

The Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell continued to dispense hospitality at their lodge in the Phœnix Park. A party of visitors were with them during the week, including Lord and Lady Gough, Mr. and Mrs. G. Locker-Lampson, Mr. Steel Maitland, M.P., and several dinner parties were given. Never before, during his tenure of office, has Mr. Birrell "mixed" to the same extent in society in Ireland; in fact, he may be said to have had last month his first chief secretarial "season" at the official residence, with its long tradition of festive "seasons." The dinners at the Chief Secretary's Lodge have been a decided success, Mr. and Mrs. Birrell being amongst the pleasantest and most unaffected of official entertainers.

The Chief Secretary's many speeches on various occasions throughout the week were always interesting and a good deal more. He not only is sympathetic regarding Irish affairs, political and otherwise; it is felt that the expressed sympathy is real, which is not always the case with officials. For all that, sympathy is not what is wanted in Ireland—so we think over here—at this stage of affairs. "Besides which," an Irish Suffragist remarked, apropos of Mr. Birrell's kindly reply to the Suffragist deputation to Dublin Castle, "we can always (like the 'most miserable' in the old riddle) find it for ourselves 'in the dictionary.'"

The Chief Secretary left Dublin at the end of the week for a short tour through the country, to complete, no doubt, his object lessons in the island, which he has such a leading part in governing before the Parliamentary autumn session begins.

The Commander of the Forces and Lady Lyttelton entertained the Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell at a large dinner party at the Royal Hospital. The guests were mainly military. Sir Neville Lyttelton is not of what might be called "the ascendancy" military type, and is credited with having some of the liberal views of his cousin, the late Lord Spencer, to whom he bears some family resemblance.

The opening of the hunting season has been the leading event in the world that amuses itself. Excellent hunting is to be had from Dublin, the Meath, Kildare, and Ward Union countries being in quite practicable proximity to the capital, especially in these motor days. Meath is still a favoured hunting ground with foreigners, and has many hospitable great houses, notwithstanding the devastations of incessant Land Acts. Lord and Lady Fingall are at Killeen, and Lord and Lady Dunsany at Dunsany for the winter. Lord Trimlestown—whose late recovery of the title of his ancestors is a romance of the peerage—is, with his family, settled at the Barnwall old residence in Meath. Lord and Lady Headfort are at Headfort, Kells, where Lady Headfort is promoting charitable interests with the pleasant combination of amusement so much in vogue in the modern world, by getting up a performance of "The School for Scandal," in which she will play Lady Teazle. Others taking part are Sir Anthony Weldon. Lord Farnham, and Mr. M. Arnott.

Amongst marriages of interest over here soon to take place is the marriage of Miss Matilda Stourton, daughter of the Dowager Lady Mowbray and Stourton (who lives at her own family place, Corbalton, in Meath) with Baron Hubert von Metzsch-Reichenbach, a German officer, whose mother was sister of the late Lord Goschen. The marriage of Captain Chichester, Lord Templemore's eldest son to Lord Powerscourt's pretty sister, Miss Clare Wingfield, is also announced. Miss Wingfield has frequently visited Powerscourt, since it was her old home, and is well known in society in Ireland. Lord Powerscourt is popular—like his father before him, though not quite to the same extent—at Powerscourt, where he lives constantly on very friendly terms with his neighbours of all classes. He was an active promoter of the "Air Meeting" at Leopardstown, at which Lady Powerscourt's ambition to conquer the air of the Wicklow mountains was so grievously disappointed, the air taking the matter of conquest into its own hands on the occasion.

It is funny to read in a contemporary that Lord Spencer was to have had an audience of the King last week to deliver up the late Earl's Garter insignia, but it was postponed in consequence of the death of Prince Francis of Teck. It so happens that Lord Spencer delivered up his brother's Garter insignia to the King at Marlborough House three weeks ago, directly after His Majesty's arrival in town from Scotland.

The Duke and Duchess of Sutherland have left Dunrobin Castle for the season, and they will divide the early part of the winter between Stafford House and Lilleshall. During the last two months the Duke and his friends have killed about one hundred deer in the forests of Ben Armine and Loch Choire.

Lord and Lady Salisbury have taken up their residence at Hatfield House for the winter, and they will entertain a series of small week-end parties until the middle of December.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon and Lady Helen Gordon-Lennox are leaving Gordon Castle, after a residence of three months, for Goodwood House, where they intend to spend the winter. The Duke's deer forests and other shootings have all been let during the past season. The late Duke always kept the forest of Glenfiddich and the Blackwater moors in his own hands.

Mrs. Henry Labouchere died quite suddenly and unexpectedly at Montughi, Florence, on Saturday evening from the rupture of a bloodvessel in the brain. She had previously been perfectly well. She did not recover consciousness after the seizure, and she died within a few hours.

The Speaker has been on a visit to Lord and Lady Northbrook at Stratton Park, and next week he will be the guest of Lord and Lady Zetland at Aske Hall. Mrs. Lowther, who is in delicate health, has been ordered to pass the winter in Ceylon, so she will leave England early in December, accompanied by her son and daughter, Mr. A. J. B. Lowther and Miss Lowther.

The Duke and Duchess of Portland have returned to Welbeck Abbey from Langwell House, Caithness, where they have been residing since the beginning of August. They intend to spend the winter at Welbeck, where there are to be several shooting parties during the next two months.

The estate of Scotscalder, in Caithness, was recently acquired by the Crown, and it has been decided by the Woods and Forests Department to convert a considerable part of the property into small holdings, for which there is a great demand in the Thurso district. The Liberals of the district are much pleased at this decision. Scotscalder consists of about 3,000 acres of arable land and 10,000 acres of moors, which afford excellent grouse shooting. It is expected that the arable land will be broken up for small holdings, while the moors will continue to be let for the shooting season. Mr. William Birkmyre has been the tenant this year. Scotscalder was purchased by the Crown from the trustees of Mr. C. S. Guthrie.

The Duke of Argyll has lost his action in the Court of Session respecting the ownership of Dunstaffnage Castle. The Duke claimed to be proprietor of this ancient and picturesque stronghold, which was at one time included in the lordship and barony of Lorne. Certain lands were conveyed by the Earl of Argyll in 1502 to Alexander Campbell (known as the left-handed), and the present Laird of Dunstaffnage (the defender in the suit) is the twentieth hereditary constable of the castle. The Duke contended that there had been no explicit grant of the castle itself on the various writs and charters connected with the estate, and, according to the old Scotch law, there must be an express grant from the superior of such property. This was the law under the feudal system, but it would have been hard if the owners of Dunstaffnage had been turned out after centuries of undisturbed possession. Practical people will be of the opinion that such a remnant (described by the judge as a considerable extent of ruined masonry) is not worth an expensive lawsuit; but Scotch proprietors have a perfect mania for litigation. There was a time when every Scotch laird with a respectable estate had on hand some "guid ganging law plea," and in those days such suits frequently lasted in the North until one of the parties was dead or ruined, for under the old procedure of the Court of Session there was no reason why they should ever end.

The results of by-elections in a general way are of little concern except to the candidates and voters concerned in them. The election at South Shields, however, is of some general interest at the present moment. Lord Robson evidently had a strong personal hold on the constituency, where, when Liberalism was at low-water mark in the country generally, he raised the local majority from 153 to 3,298, and at his last election was returned by a majority of over 4,000. On the retirement of a popular member like this it is the rule for his successor to suffer at the polls, and that Mr. Rea's majority should have been a thousand below Lord Robson's last is therefore of little significance—especially in an election on a stale register. What really is significant is that his opponent only added some fifty votes to the Unionist poll in January, and that the Unionists cannot muster to-day in Shields as many votes as they did in 1895, although the Liberal poll has increased by close on 3,000.

So far as any general inference can be drawn from the polling of one constituency, this result gives not the slightest hope that Unionism is gaining ground in the North. Until there is such hope the party can gain nothing by a general election. The last election showed beyond all possibility of doubt that England north of the Trent, Scotland, and Wales are solidly set against Tariff Reform. These stiff-necked Free Traders have to be converted before a Unionist majority can be returned to Westminster; and the conversion, if it is to affect the result of a general election, must be on a very extensive scale, because the more fickle South, having gone pretty solidly against the Liberals at the last election, is pretty sure to make them a present of several seats at the next.

From this point of view the South Shields election is calculated to strengthen the current impression that a general election at the present date, or in the course of the next few months, is unlikely to make much change in the composition of the House of Commons. This impression has a great deal to do with the current talk of compromise on the constitutional question, or the relegation of all outstanding constitutional questions to a further and larger conference. Very naturally. To appeal to the country with every probability that the answer will be indecisive, and that parties will return to Westminster more or less as they left it, is a thing that nobody can desire to do. We may consequently take it that if the Constitutional Conference can recommend nothing better than that there shall be more conferring, the disposition of politicians generally will be to fall in with that suggestion. It is not surprising, therefore, to see "Pacificus" still flying his kites, and the Editor of the Times helping to hold the string.

To Free Traders of all sections the return of Mr. Russell Rea to the House of Commons is highly welcome. As a representative of our greatest industry, and a particularly able controversialist, he has been a tower of strength to his side since Protection came to life again among us. And, apart from controversy, he is an M.P. of the most useful type, and was much respected in the last Parliament.

Lord Charles Beresford made merry the other day over the distress which Mr. McKenna suffers from having "opposite to him in the House of Commons a man who really knows what he is talking about." As long as the Opposition can only muster one champion endowed with this measure of intelligence, I should have thought that a Minister might be able to retain his composure. What, however, is of more general consequence is the question whether Lord Charles—supposing, as I do, that he is the Super-Dreadnought in the Opposition fleet which is to silence the big guns of the Admiralty—really knows what he is talking about.

Only the other day he was firing off at Mr. Asquith prophetic statistics showing the relative numbers of the German and British first-class battle fleets in 1913. Mr. McKenna gave calculations immediately afterwards showing that Lord Charles' figures were all wrong. When it is a mere question of simple addition, there is no reason why Mr. McKenna should not understand what he is talking about as thoroughly as Lord Charles. Personally, I should prefer to take my arithmetic from him, and I think he is also in a better position to be correctly informed as to what is doing both in British and German dockyards.

Since this episode, however, the Daily Telegraph has been pointing out the important addition which the introduction of the 13.5 gun will make to the fighting value of our forthcoming ships. Probably the Daily Telegraph was carried away by its patriotic fervour when it represented the German designers and builders as staggered by the apparition of this new weapon. There is no particular secret about the gun in this country. It was tried some time ago, and presumably the Germans discovered it long before the Daily Telegraph. But the point is that Lord Charles Beresford, when he did his sum in simple addition, must have cast up his units without troubling his head to consider whether they are all of equal value. He and his school have satisfied themselves that a "pre-Dreadnought" ship is a thing of no account; for that reason, the greater part of our battleships must be left out of the calculation when we are comparing our own fleet with a foreign one. But when you get beyond that magic date, the launch of the first Dreadnought, this method of reckoning no longer holds good. All subsequent ships are of equal value. One Dreadnought is as good as another, and when you have added them up you have calculated the strength of a fleet with scientific precision.

Personally, I have not the slightest faith in any calculations of this nature, whether of ships, or tonnage, or guns. My belief is that naval battles have always been won, from the first that was ever fought down to the last, by superiority in men, and nothing else. I am a landsman, and I suppose Lord Charles Beresford would say that for that reason, like Mr. McKenna, I do not know what I am talking about. But it seems to me an extraordinary thing that a sailor, purporting to be of the same race as Drake and Nelson, and presumably having some regard for the traditions of the Service he adorns, should go about preaching to landsmen that in naval war the only thing that tells is the size and number of ships, and implying at the same time that men count for nothing.

Be that view right or wrong, there is one point on which any landsman is as competent to form an opinion as any admiral in the Service or out of it. It is a point accentuated by what we have heard about the new guns, and it is that, while naval architecture and gunnery are developing from year to year, and almost from month to month, it is folly to spend on either ships or guns of the type in fashion at a given moment more than the irreducible minimum consistent with safety for the time being and the immediate future.

Lord Charles Beresford's nautical arithmetic is worked out as an argument for a huge loan for naval construction. Whatever may be the truth about his arithmetic, the answer to him remains that it is not business to squander a loan on building a huge fleet of ships, with every probability that in seven years' time, or less, we shall be told that they are out of date and not worth counting when we reckon up our strength, as in the case of the "pre-Dreadnoughts." For that reason, among many others, I should hope that a nation of business men will never consent to such folly. The same argument applies to Mr Balfour's preposterous contention that as long as a slip in the country capable of holding a "Dreadnought" is unoccupied it is the duty of the Government to lay down a "Dreadnought" upon it.

The new Portuguese Government ought to be pressed to give its attention to the quarantine arrangements at Delagoa Bay. The South Africa British Indian Committee has received particulars of the shocking treatment nearly a hundred Indians lately experienced during their detention in the Bay owing to the occurrence of a case of smallpox on the steamer by which they were passengers. For nearly a week they were kept on a leaky old hulk without any proper or regular supply of food or even water, and eventually the port medical officer ordered their removal to Salisbury Island. The detention hulk was utterly unfit for habitation, and steps should be taken to ensure that it is not used again.

A correspondent writes:—

I have read with interest your reference to the scheme for raising a "testimonial" to Charles Dickens in the form of a sum of money for his descendants.

The plea as to the law of copyright having prevented Dickens from securing adequate provision for his family is ridiculous. But as he sold his copyright for large sums, his descendants would not have benefited even if the law had been different.

Dickens left just £93,000, and about £45,000 represented literary gains, the remainder coming from his readings and from the proceeds of the sale of Gad's Hill and its contents. It must be remembered that Dickens began with nothing, and that out of the proceeds of his literary work he lived expensively for about thirty-four years and brought up and launched a large family. It is preposterous to judge any popular author's literary gains by the amount he leaves behind him. Not many years ago an authoress who had enjoyed a very long run of success died, leaving about £2,000, the remainder of her gains from literature (not less than £50,000) having gone year by year in the expenses of living.

The eldest surviving son of Charles Dickens has lately returned to England, after an absence of forty-five years in Australia, and he is delivering a course of lectures on his father's life and work. Last week Mr. A. T. Dickens lectured at Glasgow, and he is reported to have "cast an interesting light on the original of Jo in 'Bleak House,'" having stated that he "was a waif who haunted Gad's Hill, and who afterwards went to Australia." This is obviously a complete mistake, for "Bleak House" was written when Dickens was living in London, and long before he purchased Gad's Hill.

Lord Morley's notice of the first volume of the Life of Lord Beaconsfield, which appeared in the Times of Thursday, is in every way most admirable. The article is of the greatest interest, and it is written in a high tone, worthy both of the author and of the subject. It may be hoped that Lord Morley will be able to review the other volumes of this work, and when the last of them has appeared the articles should be published in book form.

Sir Hugh Lane has gone to South Africa to superintend the hanging of the collection of modern pictures which has been formed for the projected Art Gallery at Johannesburg. The collection consists of about 120 pictures, and they have either been gifts or have been purchased through private subscription. One of the most notable works is the famous "Passage of the Rhine," by Géricault, which is a gift from Sir Julius Wernher. This fine picture was long in a private collection in Paris, and it was offered some years ago to the Trustees of the National Gallery, who very unwisely declined to purchase it. The exhibition of these pictures is to be formally opened by the Duke of Connaught on November 29.

Mr. A. E. Shipley, who was last week elected to the Mastership of Christ's College, Cambridge, in the place of the late Dr. John Peile, has been a Fellow and tutor there since 1887. He gained the highest honours in both sections of the Natural Science Tripos, and since he became Reader in Zoology his classes have been very largely attended. He has a European reputation as a most distinguished specialist. He is popular in the University, and he has been widely known as one of the most hospitable of the resident dons. He has taken an active part in general University work, and he is familiar with every branch of its administration, in which he has shown himself a good man of business and a judicious reformer.

A new Archdeaconry has been created in the diocese of Southwell. Bishop Hoskyns has appointed the Rev. E. F. Crosse, vicar of Chesterfield, to be the first Archdeacon of Chesterfield. The stipend will be £200 a year. There are now three Archdeaconries in this diocese, the others being Derby and Notts.

The Peache Trustees have presented the Rev. A. E. Chapman, vicar of St. Nathanael's, Cotham, Bristol, to the living of St. Mary's, Luton, in the place of Canon Mason. This is an excellent choice for a very important and onerous charge. Mr. Chapman, who is an Evangelical, is a very popular clergyman, an able organiser, and a good preacher. The church at Luton is one of the finest in Bedfordshire.

The Bishop of Chichester's crusade against the Brighton Ritualists has not had a very triumphant ending. The Wagner Trustees have presented the Rev. W. H. Carey, vicar of St. Michael and All Angels, Woolwich, to the Church of the Annunciation; and St. Bartholomew's has been offered to the Rev. R. Ross, vicar of St. Michael's, Shoreditch. These two clergymen both hold very "advanced" views, and it will be a marvel if there is any material alteration in the ritual and practice of the Brighton churches under the new incumbents

High Churchmen are very angry with the Bishop of Hereford, who gave "a hearty consent" to a proposal that Canon Bannister should attend a Wesleyan Harvest Festival for the purpose of delivering an address on "The Vision of Unity." Bishop Percival and Canon Bannister are very much more practically Christian in spirit than those dignitaries and clergy who maintain the cold, patronising, and exclusive attitude towards Dissenters and Presbyterians of the Bishop of Birmingham and others of his school.

The Simeon Trustees have presented the Rev. G. Hemming to the important living of Emmanuel, Clifton, vacant by the preferment of the Rev. T. A. Gurney. Mr. Hemming, who is Rural Dean of Clifton, succeeded Canon Wallace as vicar of Holy Trinity in 1892, and he had previously worked in the diocese of London. He has earned preferment by eighteen years of hard work in a large and very poor parish. He is an Evangelical and an excellent preacher. The stipend of his new benefice, which is mainly derived from pew rents, was formerly about £650 a year, and there is an excellent house, but of late years the vicar's income is said to have fallen to £350.

There is a curate at York who has had a reminder from the magistrates that in these days the powers of the Church are limited. His name is the Rev. Noel Hawdon. He dropped a half-crown in the mud, but did not hear it fall. Discovering his loss a few moments later, he returned to search for it. He found it in the possession of two boys, and came to the conclusion that they intended to appropriate it. This the boys denied, so he offered them the alternative of the police-station or a thrashing. Thoroughly frightened, the boys were induced to walk to the curate's house, where he took them indoors and administered to each a severe castigation. For this he got off lightly enough with a fine of £1 and costs in each case, but no doubt the lesson will be useful.

With reference to my remarks upon the agreement which probationers are required to sign on joining the nursing staff of the Western Infirmary of Glasgow, the correspondent on whose authority I stated that the agreement had been declared not binding by a decision of Lord Justice Stormonth Darling now informs me that that decision was not given in regard to one of the infirmary agreements, but on a somewhat similar unilateral contract. However, it seems clear that though the validity of the infirmary agreement has not itself been tested in a court of law, the decision referred to supplies a precedent for the future by which all such contracts are interpreted in the Scottish courts.

Colonel Bingham, who is a younger brother of Lord Lucan, will shortly retire from the command of the 1st Life Guards, after eighteen years' service in that regiment. He had previously served in the 3rd Hussars and in the 2nd Life Guards. It is expected that he will be succeeded by Brevet-Colonel E. B. Cooke.

Colonel Cowan, late Royal Horse Artillery, who was for some time Commandant of the Royal Military Academy, has been appointed to the command of the East Lancashire Territorial Division, in the place of Brigadier-General Fry, who goes to the War Office for special service.

One of the departments of the War Office has now before it, I believe, plans for certain additions—miscalled improvements—to married soldiers' quarters at Aldershot. These plans propose to place sanitary structures, the only proper place for which is at the back of the buildings, not only in the front, but actually opening out of the entrance porches, and blocking up the windows of the front rooms. By what process of reasoning the Royal Engineers, who have charge of the matter, have arrived at the conclusion that this is a suitable arrangement, or a proper way of spending money on "improving" barracks, Heaven only knows. The plan is utterly wrong and indefensible, and ought not to be passed, and it is to be hoped that this will be perceived at the War Office without the necessity of Parliament interfering.

Apropos of sanitary matters in the Army, the following facts mentioned to me the other day may be worth recording. In a depot in the West of England a case of enteric fever occurred about twelve months ago, and was pretty clearly traced to sanitary shortcomings in the house outside barracks where the patient lodged. There has been no other case of enteric in the depot for many years. Recently a man attached to the depot has gone to live in the same house, only doing so because he could not get quarters elsewhere. My informant stated that soldiers have great difficulty in getting decent quarters in the town, the chief objection to many of the houses being their unwholesome condition; and he added that things might be different if R.A.M.C. officers took more interest in the way soldiers are housed outside barracks. There may be justification for this remark. The Duke of Connaught once gave R.A.M.C. officers a hint that they ought to keep in touch with the local medical practitioners and sanitary authorities, but it is doubtful whether the hint has been generally taken.

The Army Council lately issued a circular containing instructions that boarded-out horses must be insured. Such a rule is quite excellent and advisable, but the circular mentioned by name one particular insurance company as being suitable for the purpose in view. It is a mistake for a Government Department to give prominence in this way to any one insurance office, however excellent, and the mistake becomes serious if the office named is not the best that could be selected. In this case the office selected, of all others in London, was the Army, Navy, and General Assurance Association. In the ordinary course of things my attention was called to this circular, whereupon I thought it might be useful to inform the War Office that the Army, Navy, and General Assurance Association had been the subject of adverse comments in TRUTH, that they were inadequately equipped financially for the safe conduct of insurance business of any kind, that they had endeavoured to prove the contrary by bringing a libel action against TRUTH, and had failed in their action.

It is satisfactory to be able to report that my communication was courteously received, and had the effect desired. I was informed that the War Office recognised the issue of the circular to have been a mistake; that it had been sent out by a subordinate department of the Army Council; and that steps would be taken at once to counteract its effect. Such an attitude disarms criticism. At the same time the episode is a little disheartening. I explained the facts about the Army, Navy and General Assurance Association mainly for the benefit of naval and military officers, among whom it works. In itself it is an insignificant concern, scarcely deserving much attention, but if the Army Council is so ignorant or so careless of insurance matters as to recommend it, how can it be expected that individual officers will abstain from patronising it? I hope the Army Council in withdrawing the circular will do its best to prevent the company gaining any indirect benefit from the official advertisement it has received; and it seems desirable to ascertain precisely how such an inexcusable mistake came to be made by those who issued the document.

It is gratifying to know that good results have followed from all that has been written in TRUTH in recent years on the needless hardships inflicted on soldiers and their families on troopships. An officer writing from India, however, observes that notwithstanding many useful improvements, "mountains of abuses still remain to be moved." He refers to some of them. Overcrowding is still one of the worst. No pretence is made of providing all the men with the means of sitting down during the day; and at night many of them have to lie where they can.

A certain amount of crowding is, of course, inevitable at sea; but a hardship for which there can be no excuse whatever is the inadequate provision for washing. This has always been a matter of complaint, and apparently no attempt has been made to improve matters. It is quite impossible for soldiers to properly wash either their persons or their clothes, and the result, says the officer above mentioned, is that "the troops land in a filthy and verminous condition"—and this only preparatory to a long journey up country, during which even the most limited form of ablution is impossible. My correspondent observes that distilled water is treated on troopships as though it were as precious as radium; but why in the name of wonder should not sea-water in unlimited quantities be provided to troops at sea? It may not be the pleasantest liquid to wash in, but a man can keep himself clean with it. I should have thought it would be a matter of little difficulty or expense to provide sea-water shower-baths where men could swill themselves every day if they wanted to.

Just one more point:—

Another very necessary reform would be to provide all troops proceedings to India, or any tropical station, with suits of khaki drill to put on just before they land. At present men are landed in home service dress, and the intense discomfort they suffer in consequence is most pitiable. If these garments were thrown overboard before coming into port, hordes of undesirable aliens would be prevented from landing in India.

Rear-Admiral Burney is named as the successor to Rear-Admiral Farquhar in the command of the Fourth Cruiser Squadron. Admiral Farquhar is not due to strike his flag under the time limit until February next, but he is high up the list of his rank, and will probably get his Vice step by the end of the year, in which event he would quit his present post. Admiral Burney was not long since succeeded by Rear-Admiral Galloway in the command of the Devonport Sub-Division of the Home Fleet. His spell of half-pay will have been comparatively short.

Commander Lowndes, who has just paid off the despatch vessel Alacrity on the China Station, has been temporarily advanced to the post of flag-captain to Admiral Sir A L. Winsloe, during the absence of Captain Caley, who has come to England in connection with the Bedford court-martial.

---

Colonel White, M.V.O., has just been appointed Inspector of Marine Recruiting in succession to Colonel A. G. Tatham, of the R.M.A. Colonel White, who is a Red Marine, has been serving as Assistant Director of Naval Intelligence for the past eighteen months. He commanded the Marine detachment of H.M.S. Renown on the Royal Indian durbar tour of 1905-6, and was with the Marine contingent of the forlorn hope which tried to save General Gordon.

I have referred from time to time to the endeavours of the Accountant Branch to obtain an improvement in the conditions of their pay and promotion. Perseverance has been at length rewarded. The Admiralty have issued a revised scale of pay which is distinctly to the advantage of the branch. With assistant clerks and clerks the conditions remain unchanged, but an assistant paymaster of two years' seniority will in future receive the pay that he has heretofore had to serve three years to attain. This will accelerate increases of seniority pay throughout all the grades. Substantially, the arrangement is equivalent to a speeding-up of promotion, and I think the paymasters have reason to be satisfied.

When such huge increases are being made in our expenditure on naval material it is rather a pleasure than otherwise to hear that a little bit is finding its way into the pockets of the personnel. The Admiralty are going to increase the pay of all lieutenants on the active, emergency, or retired list who may be employed on special service by the addition of 1s. a day command money. This will include all officers in charge of torpedo units and submarines. Sixpence a day repair money is also to be allowed henceforth to carpenters of destroyers, "at discretion." This lordly boon may or may not be regarded as an answer to the recent observation in TRUTH, that the unfortunate carpenters have received no increase in anything but the volume of work and responsibility for thirty years past. The Admiralty and the carpenters will look at the matter from different points of view.

A case that was brought to my notice the other day bears upon what was said last week respecting the attitude of bishops towards the "unattached" clergy. A naval chaplain, after having reached that not very enviable position, found himself a martyr to sea-sickness, and was obliged to retire. He has applied to bishops, both English and Scotch, for work until he has got tired of it, and he now seems to have drifted permanently into the ranks of the unemployed. His experience with the bishops is a little difficult to reconcile with all that we hear about the dearth of curates. The lesson which he draws himself is that young clergymen should understand clearly before they enter the Navy that by so doing they sever themselves from all hope of shore employment, if for any reason they wish to leave the sea.

My recent paragraphs regarding the employment of school children as street collectors for a charity at Bath were discussed at the following meeting of the Education Committee, and the matter was referred to a committee for inquiry. I shall be interested to hear the result of this inquiry. Meanwhile it is disquieting to find that some of these educationists appeared unable to perceive anything objectionable in what occurred beyond the offering of prizes to the children for the largest collections. The statement I made as to the prizes was practically confirmed by one of the speakers. Quite apart, however, from that feature of the affair, the sending of children on to the streets to beg for any society that chooses to utilise their services in this way is a mischievous and demoralising proceeding, and it is amazing that any members of an Education Committee should be seemingly ready to approve of it.

As to the prevalence of cadging for charities—some of them notoriously bogus charities—at Bath, my remarks appear to have been resented. The accuracy of what I said was, however, borne out by Alderman E. E. Phillips, who remarked that "he had been asked more than once what they were about in Bath in allowing this begging in the street; some of the begging which went on might even come under the Vagrancy Act." Bath must, of course, decide for itself whether this state of things is desirable in the interests of the city. I should think myself, though, that visitors would be better pleased if there were fewer appeals to their benevolence.

By a majority of forty-one votes against thirty-two the Manchester City Council last week rejected a proposal to refer to arbitration the claim of the Mutual Telephone Syndicate for the repayment of the expenditure it incurred for the improvement and consequent cheapening of the local telephone service. It was expenditure incurred with the encouragement of the Council for the public benefit, and under the peculiar circumstances, which have previously been explained in TRUTH, the Council was morally bound to refund the money. That it should still persist in its refusal to fulfil that obligation is extremely discreditable to Manchester.

The Ruthin Guardians are still groaning at the necessity for providing a new infirmary imposed upon them by the Local Government Board. Last week they made another attempt to evade their duties until the Local Government Board inspector told them point-blank that his board would stand their shilly-shallying no longer. Even then they only got as far as deciding that at its next meeting they should consider the advisability of appointing an architect to prepare plans. At this rate of progress the new infirmary will probably be built sometime in the next century, and the sick Ruthin poor must continue to suffer in order to save Bumble's pocket. I hope Mr. John Burns will make an example of them. They richly deserve it.

The Inverness Parish Councillors are very wroth at a report made by the Local Government Board Superintendent of the Poor for the Northern Counties as to their administration of relief. They thought that the superintendent ought to have consulted them before censuring them, but showed how useless such a consultation would have been by strenuously denying that there was any reason for censure. The superintendent, who was present, however, stuck to his guns and roundly declared that the Council were giving relief to undeserving persons and subsidising dirt and disease. The only effect was to produce further denials and a declaration that the Council would have no dictation from the Local Government Board. They will have to amend their ways, or I am afraid that they will find, as Bumble has found before, that the present Local Government Board has means for bringing recalcitrant guardians to their senses.

For some reason totally inexplicable the Wrexham Town Council have refused to publish the report they have obtained upon the recent ptomaine outbreak at that town. It is true that they have made known the effect of the document, which reveals the fact that the outbreak was due to the employment of a germ-carrier at a bakehouse where certain pork pies were made, but the document itself they decline to make public. Their refusal to take this course is the more surprising since the report is of much more than local interest. It was prepared after lengthy experiment and close inquiry by the pathologists of the Royal Institute of Public Health, and presents such a picture of successful research that it must necessarily be of high scientific interest to everyone interested in the study of preventive medicine.

Apropos of this matter, I was rather surprised to learn the other day of the comparative failure of public bodies and private persons to make use of the advantages offered by the Royal Institute of Public Health for investigation of medico-legal subjects, such as the application of the new precipitin test for determining whether bloodstains are of human origin or merely those of the lower mammals. The Institute has admirably equipped laboratories for researches of a bacteriological, serological, and chemical nature, and a staff of the highest scientific attainments, and it is a pity that these should not be employed to the full capacity. Given an adequate amount of support, the Institute could do a great deal more than it does at present in the interests of public health on the lines of original research. Such neglect compares very unfavourably with the support accorded both publicly and privately to research work in Germany.

In this country institutions where original research can be undertaken may be numbered on the fingers, and it is all the more surprising, therefore, that their usefulness should obtain such scant recognition.

Once again Liverpool has shown itself to be the most sectarian-ridden community in the kingdom, or at least this side of the Irish Channel. Since the death of Mr. Shepherd Little over three months ago the post of stipendiary magistrate has been vacant, and the reason for delay in making a new appointment has just been made public. The Home Secretary has informed the Town Clerk that he is not satisfied with the manner in which increases upon the initial salary of £1,000 attaching to the office have been made in the past, when they have been made the subject of controversial debate by the council. He expressed the opinion that discussion of an increase of the salary of a judicial officer from a partisan or sectarian point of view was consonant neither with public policy nor the dignity of the city, and he suggested the fixing of a salary with an automatic scale of increment.

This sensible proposal for removing the magisterial bench from the region of sectarian strife at first found favour with the Finance Committee of the Liverpool Corporation, and they decided to bring forward a recommendation embodying the proposals. The proposals were duly brought forward at the meeting of the Corporation last week, but only to be rejected. There had evidently been some occult influence at work, for even members of the Finance Committee who had been in favour of the course suggested made an ignominious volte face. I should have thought that any one who had the interests of Liverpool at heart would have welcomed any step to put an end to the faction fighting for which the city has paid so heavily, but evidently the majority which controls the Council are mere puppets in the hands of the noisy Protestant section, who would like to control police and bench even as they control the corporation.

With a kindly opportuneness which I much appreciate in view of recent events, Messrs. Butterworth have sent me a new edition of "Oswald on Contempt." I flatter myself that I am fairly familiar with that masterly treatise, but the new edition, for which Mr. G. Stuart Robertson is responsible, contains a good deal of fresh matter, and the 650 cases originally cited by the late Mr. Oswald have now been increased to 1,300. These figures seem to me somewhat significant.

The Chief Constable of Cumberland and Westmoreland has devised, and the Standing Joint Committees have adopted, an ingenious device for getting round the Police Weekly Rest Day Act. The new law entitles every constable to fifty-two days' leave a year, and "as far as practicable" it is to be so arranged that he shall have one day off in every seven. The latter provision is put aside in Cumberland and Westmoreland, but it is contended that the police already receive the required fifty-two days' leave per annum, this aggregate being made up by counting in the two hours allowed each Sunday to those constables who choose to attend church or chapel! On the Chief Constable's own showing it is clear that unless a man is willing to spend 104 hours per annum in a place of worship he will not get the leave which the law has given him. This is an obviously unwarrantable interpretation of the Act, and the Cumberland and Westmoreland police ought to bring the matter before the Home Secretary.

One hears a good deal about the Parisian Apache, but if one were to judge by an occurrence at Poplar last week the London hooligan is an equally dangerous beast, and even more immune from interference when on the war path. On this occasion a party of youths armed with iron bars and revolvers took possession of the streets at 8.30 in the evening. They felled one harmless wayfarer, made an attempt to force their way into a gas works, and made off, shooting indiscriminately at anyone they chance to meet, a man who went to his door to ascertain the cause of the commotion being badly wounded. What the police were doing during these proceedings is unexplained, for none of the hooligans were captured. Probably they thought discretion the better part of valour, though this is an attitude not usually associated with the London police force.

To minister to the avidity of the public interested in racing it has been the practice of some of the evening newspapers to have the latest results inserted in their stop-press columns by local agents. The results are telephoned to the agent, and by means of a stamping or printing apparatus he is able to supply his customers with papers containing later intelligence than would otherwise be possible. Last week an Islington newsagent who had been employed in this way by the Evening News was prosecuted at the County of London Sessions for keeping and using his premises for the purpose of betting. His shop was undoubtedly frequented by people desirous of obtaining the latest racing news, but it was not alleged that there was any passing of money for bets in the shop, nor did the police discover any betting slips or other evidence of betting. Nevertheless the defendant was convicted and fined £15 and costs.

This is a really striking illustration of the way in which our anti-betting laws strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. In some caustic remarks on that subject the other day Mr. Justice Darling pointed out that Parliament had never forbidden newspapers from publishing the odds—"that would have been a much too obvious way of suppressing betting." Whether Parliament ought to adopt that course is a question on which opinions will differ. I think, however, that there can be no two opinions as to the preposterous absurdity of the present state of the law in which it is perfectly lawful for papers giving racing results and betting odds to be printed wholesale, but a criminal offence for such information to be inserted in the papers at a newsagent's shop.

Irish magistrates are no more exempt from judicial aberration than their English brethren. Last week the Carrickmacross Bench dealt with a case of cruelty to a child of three and a-half years by her father and stepmother. She weighed only 21 lbs., her head and body were covered with vermin, her back was torn and bleeding and her bones protruding through the skin. What made the case worse was the fact that the stepmother's own children were plump, healthy, and well cared for, yet the magistrates merely fined the man £2 and costs and the woman £1 and costs. One would have thought that even the muddled mind of an Irish Shallow would have realised that such a penalty was totally inadequate.

A man was charged before the Neath magistrates last week with leaving his wife and child chargeable to the union. In his defence he urged that he had been in prison during the period the relief had been granted, and had only been released on October 10. It may have been his fault, therefore, that the wife and child became chargeable to the rates, but his excuse seems a valid reason for his neglect to maintain them, and it is impossible to guess how the Neath magistrates can justify the sentence of a month's imprisonment which they imposed. Their action seems too much like kicking a man when he is down to accord with the British sense of fair play.

An outrageous instance of brutality was revealed at a case heard before the County Court Judge at Newbridge, County Kildare, on October 22. The defendant was the proprietor of a Curragh training establishment named M'Guire, and he was sued by a jockey apprentice for £10 damages for injuries received. The lad had disobeyed instructions, and his master took him into a room, stripped him, and thrashed him with a whip for twenty minutes, his body being covered with weals from head to foot. Judge Brereton Barry, in giving judgment for the sum claimed, declared that M'Guire's conduct would have disgraced a slave-driver in the worst days of slavery. Training establishments have an evil reputation for the treatment accorded apprentices, and revelations such as this will not do anything to dissipate it.

I am glad to find that the prompt inquiry which Mr. Winston Churchill made into the case of Maud Nankivell, whom the Plymouth magistrates sent to gaol for a month for deserting her illegitimate child, has resulted in the exoneration of the magistrates concerned from any suspicion of undue harshness towards this young woman. So far from their having done any injustice to Maud Nankivell, it would seem that she richly deserved all she got, for she left her baby by a trick in the hands of a woman poorer than herself, spending the money earned in the situation obtained for her in drink, and losing the situation eventually through her excess.

If any injustice has been done at all, it is to the magistrates who adjudicated in the case, and especially to Captain Inskip, the chairman of the Bench. The blame, however, should be laid on the right shoulders. My remarks were founded on the reports which appeared in the local newspapers, together with correspondence from persons who stated that they had been in court and heard the case tried. It is now evident that either the facts of the case were not placed fully before the court or that the reports were garbled. I should hesitate to believe that the latter is the true explanation, for the wilful garbling of a report of magisterial proceedings in order to provide sensational copy is not yet a common practice in English journalism

MORAL SURGERY.

("Removal of bad teeth and enlarged tonsils has in certain cases afforded a remedy for moral waywardness."—Dr. G. A. Auden.)

In cell so cold alone I sit Upon a bare board restin',
'Mid gloomy musings I recall
Why prison clothes I'm drest in.
I perpetrate again the crime
For which I'm in the quarries—
But I should not be doing time
Except for dental caries.

My reverie is dark and sad,
With vain reproaches blended—
Alas! that when a little lad
My throat was not attended!
In Portland I had never been,
With all life's pleasures shut out,
If my large tonsils had been seen
And by a surgeon cut out.

Another of Farkasch's teeth shops has been receiving well-merited exposure in the county court. This time it was the Leeds Hygienic Institute, Limited, which was sued in the Dewsbury County Court by a workingman patient for damages for negligence. His Honour Judge Gent awarded the plaintiff £25 damages, and in giving judgment remarked that the case had been defended in a manner which reflected a great deal more discredit on the defendant company than if it had not been defended at all. He had not the slightest doubt that the witnesses for the defence—the employees of the company—were party to a discreditable and roguish attempt to defraud the plaintiff, and he complimented the dentists and doctors who appeared for facing the inconvenience and annoyance of legal proceedings in order to warn the public against that kind of thing. Farkasch and his hedge-dentists must by this time, however, be fairly well case-hardened to such remarks.

The conviction at Leicester Assizes of Lucien Stockvis, alias "Joe Drake," and Herbert C. Russell, alias "H. Rouse," was doubly interesting to me. Both men have been pilloried in TRUTH as shady bookmakers, and their frauds at the expense of reputable betting agents were perpetrated by means of the dodge of "back-coding" telegrams, which was first brought to light in these columns some years ago. They thoroughly deserved the six months' imprisonment to which Mr. Justice Bucknill sentenced them, and I should think the Stewards of the Jockey Club must now regret that they permitted "Joe Drake" to continue a registered owner of racehorses long after the character of his business had been exposed in TRUTH.

Continuing Pizzey's remarkable record as a tipster of unplaced horses, one of his patrons tells me that in the past fortnight he has received fourteen selections out of which he got one short-priced winner. success among twenty-six predictions. Still, by dint of bold advertisements about his "phenomenally successful prognostications" this Ascot prophet can always find fresh greenhorns to take the place of his disillusioned dupes.

His price for this precious information was 5s., and with it he was giving away a fountain pen "valued at 10s. 6d.," so that whenever you used it you would have "happy recollections of Melville's Memorial Cambridgeshire of 1910." The tip was Whisk Broom. The pen has not yet been supplied, but when it comes the recipient should use it to write himself down in the character aspired to by Dogberry.

Transcending in importance any reduction, however sweeping, in the rate of interest claimed by a moneylender is the decision of Mr. Justice Neville in a Chancery case last week. Superficially the case appeared to be concerned merely with some rather technical points of law, and it was consequently ignored by most of the daily papers, but the questions at issue actually involved a sum of no less than £40,000. A young man named Edmund Robinson, son of the late Peter Robinson, created certain charges to that amount on his then contingent share in his father's estate. These securities, four in number, were given respectively (1) to Charles Alfred Bond and John Colin Bennet jointly, (2) to Bennet, and (3) and (4) to "Lewis and Co." The last-named was a moneylending firm of which Bond and Bennet were the registered partners.

It was found that C. A. Bond was not a real partner in "Lewis and Co.," but a mere nominee of his brother, George Cresswell Bond, who supplied the capital of the firm. Mr. Justice Neville held that in consequence of this "there was in fact no such firm" as that registered in the name of "Lewis and Co.," and that the securities given to the firm were therefore void. It furthermore appeared that C. A. Bond and Bennet were not registered either separately or jointly (except as "Lewis and Co."), and their transactions with Robinson were accordingly likewise void under the Moneylenders Act. The moneylenders had assigned all these securities to a third party, who contended that he was entitled to recover from Robinson's estate as a bonâ fine holder for value, having had no notice of the defect in the moneylenders' registration. Mr. Justice Neville decided, however, that in view of the section of the Act rendering the original contracts void, any claim even by a bonâ fide assignee must also fail. The net result of the judgment is to wipe out securities for £40,000. It is a costly lesson in moneylending law, not only for moneylenders, but for those who take assignments from them.

Merton College and the Bullingdon Club have already disowned "T. Langton," the moneylender's tout, and now I am assured that his name does not occur in the Rugby school register. The statements in his advertisement are therefore absolutely mendacious.

Since the judgment of the House of Lords in regard to the use of aliases—the legal euphemism is "trade names"—the poor moneylender "dunno where 'e are." To be on the safe side, the tout who formerly called himself "S. J. Smith," 10, Prince's Street, W., is now issuing his circulars in his real name of S. J Shimberg. On the other hand, Harry Michaelson still signs himself "Harry Harris" in those offers of strictly private cash advances which he distributes from 6, Old Cavendish Street, W.

There is, by the way, a "Samuel Harris" as well as a "Henry Harris" in this line of business. "Samuel Harris" operates from addresses at Leeds and at Cardiff, and when I last had occasion to look up these usury-shops in the register at Somerset House I found that the name used was that of a person described as in partnership with Abraham Isaacs. A case before Mr. Justice Channell last week shows that another member of the tribe of Isaacs, Jacob to wit, is now embraced in the "Samuel Harris" firm. In the case in question a borrower was sued for the balance of a loan and interest which under a default clause worked out at the rate of 140 per cent. per annum. He paid into Court the balance of the principal, with 25 per cent. interest, and judgment was given in his favour, his lordship holding that the usurers' claim was harsh and unconscionable.

Here is an interesting example of the manner in which ladies who advertise for servants are liable to be victimised. A lady who advertised for a cook received a reply from a woman who gave an address at Clewer, near Windsor, and ultimately an appointment was made for a meeting at Victoria Station. The interview took place, and proving satisfactory subject to the references proving all right, the lady was induced to pay 23s. rail and cab fares to the cook. A day or two afterwards, however, the mistress received a letter from the cook saying that her late employer had been taken seriously ill, and was unable to furnish the reference required.

This letter was followed by a second lengthy epistle. At the interview the mistress had told the cook that she was also in want of a kitchenmaid. The cook said that after the interview she had set out to find the kitchenmaid, and the search had taken her into Hertfordshire. As a consequence she had to stop at an hotel, and on her return to Clewer the next morning found that her services were dispensed with. She asserted that she had lost her situation and was out of pocket £3 through her anxiety to oblige the future mistress. Local inquiries, however, revealed the fact that she had been merely occupying lodgings at Clewer for a few days, and that her real residence was in London. It is quite a common thing for bogus servants to make use of a country address and to pretend that they have to come to London to keep an appointment, and ladies should be on their guard against them.

Rather a novelty in begging letters was received the other day by a lady who happens to be a neighbour of Mr. W. W. Astor. It came from an individual named

THE LUXURY OF A BATH is incomplete without the addition of SCRUBB'S AMMONIA, which refreshes and invigorates. Sold everywhere, price one shilling per bottle.

Rudolf Mansfeld, who gives as his address Dresden-Neust. 17, and on whose printed notepaper heading appears both a telegraphic address and a telephone number. Mansfeld encloses the copy of a previous plea for assistance which he had addressed to Mr. Astor, and to which he had received no reply, and a picture postcard of two children for whom he implores compassion. The copy of the letter which purports to have been sent to Mr. Astor is a remarkable document. In it Mansfeld tells a story of how in 1893 when bathing on the beach at Atlantic City he rescued a boy of eight who was in danger of drowning, but was so modest that he concealed his identity, even when he heard that the boy's father was anxious to bestow 100,000 dollars on the rescuer. Now he is in Dresden as an importer of Cape flowers from South Africa, and as his business is not flourishing he feels that he cannot be proud and bashful any more, and as he did not know the name of the man whose son he had rescued he thought he would ask Mr. Astor to make inquiries for him.

Perhaps he thought, too, that there was so much fellow-feeling between millionaires that Mr. Astor would advance part of the 100,000 dollars unclaimed reward on account. But in this case it is satisfactory to think that he has been mistaken, for this is by no means a solitary attempt of Rudolf Mansfeld to supplement the income derived from his unprofitable business in Cape flowers by simple beggary. So long ago as November, 1907, he was telling the same story of his bashfulness and bravery, and recently he has been confiding it to many besides Mr. Astor. I hope he will not victimise many people. There are quite enough beggars in this country without adding to their ranks those made in Germany.

The Lord Mayor's decision not to raise a Mansion House Fund for the relief of the sufferers by the Charing Cross Bank failure will meet with general approval. It is a calamity, no doubt, but a calamity very different in character from those always associated with appeals from the Mansion House, and if the Lord Mayor had started a fund in this case it is difficult to see how he could have refused to do so whenever any considerable number of people are losers through making ill-advised investments. I imagine that I am one of the heaviest losers by Mr. Carpenter's bankruptcy, and my loss has been incurred by warning people of the danger of entrusting him with their money. But I cherish no expectation that a Mansion House Fund will be opened for my benefit.

No inconsiderable portion of the losses is made up of comparatively large sums belonging to persons who, by reason of their position and education, ought to have known better, but who allowed their greed to overcome their common sense. Some, too—as I know from letters that reached me when I attacked the bank—deluded themselves into believing that their seven or ten per cent. was safe because Carpenter was (as they wrongly supposed) using the money in sixty per cent. usury. I think what has happened serves them right. At the same time I recognise that among the twenty odd thousand depositors there must be a large number whose ignorance and poverty really do make them deserving objects of sympathy, and though it is not a case in which the charitable machinery of the Mansion House should be set in motion I hope that a fund will be raised for their relief.

In referring to this matter a week ago I said that I knew of no newspaper except the Manchester Guardian which refused to insert the Charing Cross Bank advertisements after the publication of the TRUTH articles. As is obvious from the context, I was speaking of the daily press. The editor of a weekly contemporary now tells me that he also refused the advertisement and warned his readers against the bank. I am glad to hear it.

I have just come across one of those curious trades which, without being exactly dishonest, depend for their profits upon successful imposition. The business is that of the seaside lapidary. I am indebted for my information in regard to it by a lady who was shown some gems which had been picked up on the beach and presumably cut by the lapidary. She was so interested that she became a gem-hunter herself. She was successful, and so were her friends, and she even had a number of the stones set in a necklet. Until a month or two ago she had never seen the lapidary who had cut the stones for her, but then, being in the neighbourhood, she paid a visit to the gem-cutter's abode in order to see how the work was done. She was, however, put off with the plea that it would only waste the man's time.

This rather excited her suspicion, and a few days later a friend informed her that some years previously she had been victimised by a lapidary who had replaced the pebbles sent by ready cut gems. She sent accordingly a dozen stones which had been named by the seaside lapidary to a well-known London lapidary, who returned them to her with the information that they were quite valueless pebbles. What the seaside lapidary had done in the previous transactions was merely to send back to her, in return for her valueless pebbles, topazes and aquamarines and such-like inexpensive gems, charging a price for cutting which would show a handsome profit on the transaction. It is an ingenious means of making a livelihood. Probably the seaside lapidary looks upon himself or herself—for there are women in the business—as a public benefactor. His customers are supplied with a healthful recreation, and he takes care that they shall not be disappointed with the results. He transforms all their pebbles into gems and makes them happy—with the bliss of ignorance.

Is it not illegal to circulate a colourable imitation of a bank note? A firm of boot manufacturers named Griffin Wards, of Ballymena, distribute as an advertisement a printed paper which in size, shape, and general get-up resembles the £1 notes of an Irish bank, and a correspondent sends me a copy of this advertisement, crumpled and soiled as a genuine note might be, which was recently passed off on an ignorant and unsuspecting person as good value for twenty shillings. The heading, "Bank of Erin," and the wording of the paper would, of course, reveal its true character to anybody reading it; but in Ireland there are a good many illiterates, and the issue of imitation notes certainly ought not to be permitted.

A NATIONAL NEED.

("There is a slump in catchwords."—Daily Paper.)

Time was when England went not empty-handed
For want of catchwords to dispel her care,
Words that about the streets were daily bandied,
Such as "There's Hair!"

And oft-times one man would accost another
In tones whose plaintive ring implied a doubt,
With the unvarying question "Does your mother
Know you are out?"

And I have heard some city urchin gaily,
With elfin grin and mischief of the gnome,
Inquiring whether Mr. William Bailey
Meant to come home.

Too silent now alas! those sweet lips (Shelley);
Though still they try to help you when they can,
Vide "Has anybody here seen Kelly?"
(Hailing from Man).

Is then our England, bent on making money,
Too apathetic in her lighter vein?
Or has her former knack for being funny
Softened her brain?

Arise! seize on some poet, and draw him in
To energise the street-boy as he walks
With catchwords culled perhaps from "Votes for Women" or Mr. Fawkes.

Let's hear him speak the catchword we are lacking
Daily along the London streets ad lib.,
And we shall listen to the jokes he's cracking
Just like a squib.

SCRUTATOR.

THE "TRUTH" TOY FUND.

THE time has arrived when I must make my annual appeal to readers of TRUTH for the means of providing toys and dolls at Christmas for the children in the hospitals and Poor-law institutions of London. The TRUTH Toy Fund now ranks as an old-established charity, having been at work for upwards of thirty years. Its purpose and needs ought, therefore, to require no very elaborate explanation. But as a new generation of readers is constantly arising, and as the number of regular readers of TRUTH has increased of late very largely, I may briefly mention a few facts which should ensure a general and liberal response to the appeal.

There were last year in the London workhouses, workhouse schools, infirmaries, and other Poor-law institutions about 22,000 children of an age to understand Christmas presents. The number tends to increase annually with the growth of London. These children, however kindly and considerately they may be treated by those in charge of them, are cut off from home life and all the associations which make Christmas joyful to children outside, even the poorest of them. The TRUTH Toy Fund enables those who are in very different circumstances to do at Christmas time a true act of kindness once a year to every child in this large and mournful pauper army—perhaps the only act of kindness that many of them receive from the outside world in the course of the year. In addition to these, about 8,000 children spent last Christmas in the London hospitals, and this figure was somewhat below the average. The number varies with the condition of health among the children of the poor in London; in some years the TRUTH Fund has provided for over 10,000. It is true that the children in the hospitals are, for the most part, only temporary inmates, and their condition is in other respects less pitiable than that of the "Children of the State." But their sickness and suffering gives them a special claim on those who are enjoying Christmas in health and strength, and I am glad that the generosity of the public has for so many years enabled them to be included among the beneficiaries of the TRUTH Toy Fund.

There are therefore in all at least 30,000 children making their appeal to the sympathy of TRUTH readers at Christmas. Judging by past experience, the number may prove to be a thousand or two more than that. To provide dolls and toys for all of them will cost in one way and another about £1,100. Towards this sum I have about £83 in hand, the deficit with which the Fund closed when the accounts for last Christmas were made up having been more than extinguished by contributions received during the current year.

Without desiring to boast, I think I may say that there are few public charities which do such a vast work—for it is a vast work to provide and distribute toys among upwards of 30,000 children—at such a trifling cost. That the cost is so low is chiefly due to the assistance of a devoted band of ladies who each year undertake to dress the whole of the dolls distributed through the agency of TRUTH. Last year 4,130 dolls, large and small, were dressed in this way. The Fund consequently only bore the cost of the dolls in a state of nature. To buy them dressed, even in the humblest style, would multiply the cost many times, and to buy them fitted out with the elaborate, tasteful, and expensive wardrobes which so many ladies bestow upon them would cost hundreds of pounds. It may be added that, the whole of the clerical and other incidental work being done by the staff of TRUTH, there is no charge upon the Fund for administrative expenses. The result is that the children receive in the shape of Christmas presents not only the whole value of the money subscribed, but a very great deal more. This I venture to point out, not in any spirit of self-glorification, but in order that each reader may understand that every penny contributed in response to the present appeal will reach those for whom it is intended without suffering diminution en route, as too often happens to charity subscriptions.

After this I hope I shall not have long to wait for the £1,000 required. It is a very small sum to ask from the readers of a paper like TRUTH. If every one who is disposed to help would do so at once, the whole amount would be raised in a week. For many reasons it is of consequence that the money should be available at the earliest possible date.

I have a supplementary appeal to make on behalf of the "Tress Barry" Fund. For twenty-three years a bag of new sixpences was sent annually at Christmas to the Editor of TRUTH with a request to distribute them among the workhouse children with the TRUTH dolls and toys. The number of sixpences was increased from time to time until it reached 11,000. The donor never divulged his identity, but on the death of Sir Francis Tress Barry in 1907 it transpired that he was the generous benefactor who had given in secret for so many years this anonymous Christmas gift to the poorest of London's children. Many readers of TRUTH expressed a hope that his death would not deprive the children of this annual treat, and offered to subscribe to a fund for keeping his benefaction and his memory alive. Accordingly, with the approval and liberal support of Sir Francis Tress Barry's family, the Tress Barry Fund has at each succeeding Christmas provided 11,000 sixpences for distribution among the Poor-law children with the TRUTH toys. It will continue to do so as long as my readers will contribute the sixpences. They can see for themselves, I am sure, what a source of delight it is to all these children, the majority of whom can scarcely know what it is to handle a penny of their own, to possess once in the year a whole sixpence to spend as they please. May I therefore beg that every donation sent to the TRUTH Toy Fund may be accompanied by a small additional contribution towards the Tress Barry sixpences? As in the case of the Toy Fund, the small deficit on the Tress Barry Fund at the end of last season has been wiped out by subsequent contributions, and I have now in hand about £25 towards the £275 required to complete this fund.

THE KING'S PARDON A TRAP FOR SOLDIERS.

I have received numerous and forcible protests against the way in which Special Army Order of May 23 last is being carried out in India. It will be within the recollection of many readers that this Army Order was due to the initiation of King George, who when he ascended the throne was "graciously pleased as an act of clemency" to approve of the remission of half the unexpired portion of the sentences of soldiers in prison, and of a pardon being granted to deserters and men who had fraudulently enlisted into the Army. Upon the faith of this order, which seemed to whitewash the military delinquents concerned, many deserters and "frauds," claiming the Royal pardon, gave themselves up without apparently being informed of the conditions which were attached to the "act of clemency," and which, as they stand, take the gilt off the gingerbread. Under paragraph 12 of the order deserters and men who have fraudulently enlisted are to be pardoned for their offences, but are to forfeit all previous service, this being the penalty exacted by Section 79 Sub-section 2 of the Army Act in case of men whose trial, for whatever cause, has been dispensed with. As a consequence of this condition men who have re-enlisted after undetected desertion—there are many such—and who, though "frauds," have done very well in their second period of Army service, have now to go back to the recruit stage and begin their service all over again. Worse than this, forfeiture of service under the above quoted section of the Army Act carries with it forfeiture of proficiency pay under Article 998 of the Royal Warrant Pay and Promotion. Worse again, the Adjutant-General has ruled—a purely discretionary ruling—that under Article 1,158 (b) of the Royal Warrant all pardoned men shall forfeit the war medals and decorations which they have earned in the field.

The Royal Pardon being thus circumscribed, it is found that in very many cases, far from doing the men any good, Special Army Order of May 23 does them irreparable harm. One case of which I have particulars is that of a non-com. who enlisted into his present battalion many years ago when in a state of desertion from another corps. Going to the Boer War with his present battalion, he was awarded the South African medal with two clasps, and finding he was doing well in his second venture in the Army he recently extended his service to complete twelve years with the colours. During the past two years he has been drawing 6d. a day proficiency pay under Article 993 of the Royal Warrant. How does he come off under the Royal Pardon Army Order? He forfeits the whole of his nine and a-half years' good service, together with his South African war medal, and has to start again as a recruit with a debt of something over £9 for proficiency pay which he is required to refund. He thinks, and I agree with him, that a pardon under such conditions is a delusion and a snare, for after nine and a-half years' service the chances of his detection as a former deserter were infinitesimal.

The case of this corporal is the case, with slight variation, of hundreds of other men who have claimed the Royal Pardon under the belief that the pardon was as genuine as his Majesty undoubtedly intended it to be, and not the sham pardon which the Army Council have made of it. The Army Act fortunately provides a remedy for what would be a grave injustice if allowed to stand. Under the same section, which exacts the penalty of forfeiture of service, the Secretary of State is unconditionally empowered, if he pleases, to restore the forfeited service. This being so, it is to be hoped that Mr. Haldane will use the powers which the law confers, and by this means give the pardoned men full value for their Sovereign's act of clemency, and put an end to a scandalous violation of his kindly intentions.

THE QUACK'S PARADISE.

The growth of medical quackery in the United Kingdom has of late years been so rapid that any serious study of the causes which have led to it is worthy of careful consideration. Such a study is to be found in the current number of the Journal of the American Medical Association, in the course of a careful comparison of the protection afforded to the British and American publics by the laws of the respective countries. According to the Journal, the time was when the United States was the dumping ground for the British quack, but of late years the current has set in the other direction, and now instead of the American public being fleeced by British vendors of nostrums, the American quack is finding that Great Britain offers him the best field for his wares. This fact is not attributed by the Journal to any special gullibility on the part of the British public. It is stated to be due entirely to the advent of the Federal Food and Drugs Act, which, being actively enforced by the Federal and State authorities, has resulted in steadily narrowing the quack medicine man's field of operations. Here our own Food and Drugs Act is neither so broad nor so specific as in the United States. Though quite adequate for protecting the public against watered milk, sanded sugar, or tuberculous beef, it is useless against the lying statements of the vendors of secret remedies, who can flaunt their pretensions to cure cancer or consumption, inebriety or heart disease, without let or hindrance.

How this laxity of the law operates the article above mentioned shows by comparing the advertising matter issued in England and America by Derk P. Yonkerman, the proprietor of the consumption-cure which figures in TRUTH Cautionary List under the name of "Tuberculozyne." In British newspapers the advertisement of this nostrum presents a picture of "Dr." Yonker-man in a dictatorial attitude under a bold headline, "Consumption Can be Cured," and goes on to state that the "Dr." has discovered a positive specific for the disease. In America the Yonkerman advertisement makes no such claims. It is merely the advertisement of a book about consumption, offering to give information how sufferers may be cured in their own homes. The reason for the difference is that the statements which appear in the English advertisements, if made in America, would bring the operations of the Derk P. Yonkerman Co. within the purview of a Post Office fraud-order, and thus close to the company the use of the mails. The newspapers and magazines publishing such an advertisement would also be liable to have their distribution through the Post Office stopped. Fear of this fraud-order is also doubtless responsible for a careful pruning of the "literature" which is sent out by the American branch of the firm. For instance, a booklet sent out to those who answer the advertisement in this country bears the title "Tuberculozyne (Yonkerman) cures Consumption." The expurgated American edition goes through the mails as "Consumption, its Diagnosis, Treatment, and Cure," and throughout the whole of its pages bears signs of the most careful editing. Thus the statement that "Tuberculozyne, the most wonderful and marvellous discovery of the age, cures consumption," is omitted altogether, nor is any mention made in the American edition of the "copper salts," of which so much is said in the English edition, to be the essential element of the cure. The omission is an important one. In the analysis of "Tuberculozyne," published in "Secret Remedies," it was shown that the merest trace of copper was present, and if the statement were to be made in the American booklet, those who made it would be liable to have a fraud-order made against them.

Even the labels on the bottles differ in the two countries. On the American labels two statements are missing from those stuck on the bottles sent out to British consumers. These claim that "Tuberculozyne" is "The only known remedy for consumption" and "An anti-toxin acting agent of the greatest therapeutic value." The reason for the omission is plain. The American Food and Drugs Act makes the publication of false statements on the label a punishable offence, and as the above statements are palpable falsehoods the vendors will not risk a possible prosecution by placing them on the American product. Finally, the Journal sums up the whole difference between the advertisement to the British and American publics as the difference between "the Lie direct" and "the Lie with circumstance." This distinction may not seem to be a great one, but in reality it is the distinction between mere puffery and the categorical false statement. In America the line is definitely drawn at puffery. The law says to the advertiser, puff your goods as much as you like, but if you make a statement which is demonstrably false you will be called to account for it. The result is that the American quack is expatriating himself to a country where no curb is placed on his imagination, and there is no law to protect the public from "the Lie direct" of label or advertisement. Nor is America the only country from which the quack comes. He comes from the Colonies which, wiser than the Mother Country, have already taken steps to protect themselves against his ravages. He comes also from France, and he comes from Germany to the land of freedom, which in this respect is the land of folly.

MY FRIEND CLAYPOLE.

There is a certain type of modern young man who is somewhat of an enigma to me. In all probability he has always existed, but it is only lately that he has thrust himself upon my notice. If you want to see him you have only to go to the Kingsway and witness Mr. Warren Bell's amusing comedy, "Company for George." There you will find him under the name of William Claypole, and so Claypole I will call him. Not the least interesting thing about him is that he exists in real life as well as on the stage. Claypole's chief characteristics are inordinate selfishness, expensive tastes, inability to work, and entire lack of means. These, I should say, are his chief characteristics to me. Other people find him extraordinarily fascinating and entertaining. Claypole is always willing to make your house his headquarters if you are willing "to do him well." He will order your whisky for you, advise you as to which are the best, and most expensive, brands of cigarettes to buy—the scent of the cheap ones which you buy yourself for economy's sake nearly makes him ill—and he looks genuinely sorry for you because you have to be continually working to pay for these things. He does not work himself, except at billiards or golf. He is genuinely concerned about his golf, and is not quite sure whether he had better not give it up altogether as he is not making the progress he would wish for, and it would not do for him to do anything badly. Better by far do nothing, but do it well; and he does nothing charmingly.

Claypole is blest with innumerable friends who ask him out and about—for golf, shooting, dinners, and theatres. Occasionally I am included in the invitations out of grudging civility, but there is manifest relief when work prevents me accepting. I am not fascinating, but Claypole is. He really is, that is his business, and people say how delightful it must be for me to have him staying with me—a privilege which I enjoy now and then. They do not realise that he sometimes makes things a little difficult. For instance, he likes to breakfast late, and I want my breakfast early. A trifling matter this, but it annoys servants, and it is better in these days to annoy Heaven than your servants. Then he has a way of accepting invitations for a few days, and you never know what day or hour he will return. When he does return he comes back in the best of health and spirits, and tells me pityingly that I should not work so hard, adding, the while he carefully selects one of my best cigars, that my work would be really much better if I took more holidays. I mentioned that he does not work. He is waiting until an opportunity shall arise which will give him a chance of making the maximum amount of money with the minimum of labour. He is really honestly sorry for me because I waste time in doing things which merely make a living, but as I will persist in so doing he borrows casual sovereigns and any of my small change, and goes off to play golf so as to be away for a time from such a pathetic exhibition of small-minded energy. I am quite sure that when he is on the links he is thinking out great schemes which will establish him on a perfectly sound financial basis, but in the meantime—well, he has an excellent time. He is always well dressed. He is strongly in favour of taxis as opposed to other means of locomotion. He occasionally goes up North or to Paris, and if he should run a bit short because staying with friends is infernally expensive, he will not hesitate to wire to you for a fiver. If he forgets to repay you, well, you have not the heart to remind him, because he probably makes himself extra agreeable on his return, and you have a pretty sure conviction that you would not get it if you did ask.

What I sometimes ask myself is, how do these Claypoles explain themselves to themselves? Some of us never have things which we cannot afford, but Claypole has the best of everything, and can afford nothing. That is what I mean when I say he has no pride. I do not think it has ever occurred to him that he has no right to things for which he cannot pay. Providence has endowed him with expensive tastes and so accordingly he gratifies them in the only way in which he can, and that is at the expense of his friends. To this end he only cultivates friends who have considerable means. I am probably the poorest of the lot, and I am sure he is sorry for me. He tells me stories of his shoots over Brown's moors, of his racing on Jones's yachts, and of his runs on Smith's cars, and I wonder whether it is to cheer me up or to excite my ambition. He is not married. He does not think very much of women. I fancy he would marry a very rich girl if he were sure she would not talk at breakfast-time, and would be willing for him to be away from home as much as ever he liked; but the responsibilities of a household are not what he would lightly undertake. His type is so prevalent that I am sure many of you have met him under another name, and will readily recognise him; but who or what is responsible for his existence? The answer, I am afraid, is that I am. I like him, I encourage him, I allow him to continue his parasitical existence, and so do all the friends of all the Claypoles. I suppose, therefore, we must not grumble.

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

II.—THE STATE, THE TRUST, AND THE RAILWAYS.

LAST week's article gave a general survey of the ramifications of the Standard Oil Trust in America, Europe, the British Colonies, and Japan. Before coming to the story of the Trust's rise and progress, it will perhaps be convenient to illustrate from recent evidence its method of dealing with the Legislature, the Judicature, and the Press in its native country.

There is a characteristic story which relates that somebody, on hearing that the site had been acquired for the new palace now completed in Queen Anne's Gate, rang up one of the heads of the "Anglo" on the telephone. "You are making a mistake," said he; "you ought to be near the City." "Oh! the City doesn't matter," replied the Standard voice on the telephone; "what we want to be near is the House of Commons." There the policy of the Standard Oil Trust is crystallised in a sentence. The trust is the most gigantic lobbyist in the world. No other association of private capitalists maintains such an espionage system; no other body of that kind has its lobbyists at so many centres of government. In most of the American State Legislatures the Standard Oil lobbyist is as well known as the Speaker. At Washington, at Ottawa, in the House of Commons, in Berlin, in Bucharest, to name but a few capitals, you will find the representatives of the Rockefellers. Their proceedings and those of the rivals who sought to checkmate them elicited a severe rebuke from that cautious journal the Spectator on the occasion of the debate upon the Flashpoint Bill. Writing on March 25, 1899, my contemporary observed:—

> The decision as to the proper flashpoint for mineral oils really involved a possible monopoly of the supply of safe oils, a monopoly worth many millions, and the signs of excited personal and pecuniary interest in the lobbies were noticed by many observant members of Parliament.

It declared that the practice of "lobbying" tended to "grow into a peculiarly subtle and dangerous form of corruption":—

> It has so grown both in America and France, and it may grow here. What with the tendency to create monopolies, the incessant variations of the tariff in some great States, and the masses of capital at the disposal of individuals or companies, the profits and losses consequent on a new law may amount to millions, and among the owners or expectants of those millions there may be some of the most unscrupulous of mankind. They have paid secret commissions all their lives, especially for "information," and they do not see why they should not pay them to induce hostile legislators not to vote against them.

The Archbold Letters.

How real the evil is was revealed in a dramatic manner nine years later in the famous Standard Oil letters which Mr. Randolph Hearst read during the American Presidential campaign of 1908. The genuineness of these letters was never questioned, although the persons implicated made some feeble attempts to put a less invidious explanation upon them. It was stated that one of the Standard Oil Company's letter books had been stolen, and our Times editorially remarked that there had been "nothing approaching the disclosures in sensational rapidity of action in the history of the American Presidential elections." The principal figure in these epistles of corruption is Mr. J. D. Archbold, the same gentleman whom we have seen recollecting so little with regard to the General Industrials Development Syndicate. As a letter writer he has a much better memory than as a witness. The first letter was addressed to Mr. J. B. Foraker, Senator for Ohio, and one of the leading members of the Republican party. It was as follows:—

> 26, Broadway, New York, March 9, 1900.
> My Dear Senator,—I have your favour of last night with inclosure, which latter, with letter from Mr. Elliott commenting on same, I beg to send you herewith. Perhaps it would be better to make a demonstration against the whole Bill, but certainly the ninth clause, to which Mr. Elliott refers, should be stricken out, and the same is true of House Bill No. 500, also introduced by Mr. Price, in relation to foreign corporations, in which the same objectionable clause occurs. Am glad to hear that you think that the situation is fairly well in hand.—Very truly yours,
> Jno. D. Archbold.
> Hon. J. B. Foraker, Washington, D.C.
> [The Mr. Elliott referred to was M. F. Elliott, general counsel for the Standard Oil Company.]

Here are some more letters of this series:—

> 26, Broadway, New York, March 26, 1900.
> Hon. J. B. Foraker, 1500 Sixteenth Street, Washington, D. C.
> Dear Senator,—In accordance with our understanding, now beg to enclose you certificate of deposit to your favour for $15,000. Kindly acknowledge receipt and oblige.—Yours very truly,
> Jno. D. Archbold.
> 26, Broadway, New York, April 17, 1900.
> My Dear Senator,—I enclose you certificate of deposit to your favour of $14,500. We are really at a loss in the matter, but I send this, and will be glad to have a very frank talk with you when opportunity offers, if you so desire. I need scarcely again express our great gratification over the favourable outcome of affairs.—Very truly yours,
> Jno. D. Archbold.
> Hon. J. B. Foraker, 1500 Sixteenth Street, Washington, D. C.
> January 27, 1902.
> My Dear Senator,—Responding to your favour of the 25th, it gives me pleasure to hand you herewith certificate of deposit for $50,000 in accordance with our understanding. Your letter states the conditions correctly, and I trust the transaction will be successfully consummated.—Very truly yours,
> John D. Archbold.
> Hon. J. B. Foraker, Washington, D. C.
> 26, Broadway, February 25, 1902.
> My Dear Senator,—I venture to write you a word regarding the Bill introduced by Senator Jones, of Arkansas, known as "S. 649," intended to amend the Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, introduced by him December 4. It really seems as though this Bill was very unnecessarily severe and even vicious.
> Is it not much better to test the application of the Sherman Act before resorting to a measure of this kind? I hope you will feel so about it, and I will be greatly pleased to have a word from you on the subject. The Bill, I believe, is still in committee.—With kind regards, I am, very truly yours,
> John D. Archbold.
> Hon. J. B. Foraker, Washington, D. C.

Senator Foraker explained that the 50,000 dollars was sent to him in order to carry out the purchase of an Ohio newspaper, and that when the deal fell through he returned the money. The American public received this explanation coldly, and the Republican party managers forced Mr. Foraker to retire from the campaign in order to try and get rid of so embarrassing an association. It will be noted that while these large sums were being sent to the Senator he was being asked to oppose anti-trust legislation in the interests of the Standard.

The Standard and the Judiciary.

But even the Bench itself was not secure from the influence of Mr. Archbold. "Th' Supreem Court is full of Standard Ile," says Mr. Dooley, the American humorist, and two other letters addressed by Mr. Archbold to Senator Foraker show how that consummation has been reached:—

26, Broadway, December 18, 1902.

My Dear Senator,—You, of course, know of Judge Burket's candidacy for re-election to the Supreme Court Bench of Ohio. We understand that his re-election to the position would be in the line of usage as followed in such cases in Ohio, and we feel very strongly that his eminent qualifications and great integrity entitle him to this further recognition.

We most earnestly hope that you agree with this view and will favour and aid his re-election. Mr. Rogers joins me most heartily in this expression to you. With kind regards, I am, very sincerely yours,

John D. Archbold.

26, Broadway, March 20, 1903.

My Dear Senator,—We are surprised beyond measure to learn that Smith W. Bennett, brother-in-law of F. S. Monnett, recently Attorney-General of Ohio, is in the race for the Attorney-Generalship of Ohio on the Republican ticket.

Bennett was associated with Monnett in the case against us in Ohio, and I would like to tell you something of our experiences and impressions of the man gained in that case. If you know him at all, I am sure you will agree that his candidacy ought not to be seriously considered from any point of view.

I would esteem it a favour to have a line from you on the subject.

Jno. D. Archbold.

Mr. F. S. Monnett, whose brother-in-law is attacked here, will appear again in the course of this history as one of the public officials whom the Standard Oil Trust failed to bribe—a most inconvenient record in Mr. Archbold's eyes. But Judge Burket was not the only judicial candidate Mr. Archbold favoured. The following letters were written by him to the Hon. W. A. Stone, Governor of Pennsylvania:—

26, Broadway, December 5, 1902.

My Dear Governor,—I am sure you will pardon any seeming presumption on my part in writing you on a subject in which, both personally and on behalf of my company, I am greatly interested. It is to urge the appointment, if at all consistent, of Judge Morrison, of McKeen, to the Supreme Court bench, vice Mitchell, deceased. Judge Morrison's character for ability and integrity needs no word at my hands, but aside from these great considerations his familiarity with all that pertains to the great industries of oil and gas in the important relation they bear to the interests of the Western part of the State make him especially desirable as a member of the court from that section.

Hoping that it may prove possible for you to favourably consider Judge Morrison's appointment, I am, with very high regard, sincerely yours,

Jno. D. Archbold.

Hon. Wm. A. Stone, Harrisburg, Pa.

26, Broadway, September 5, 1900.

Hon. Wm. A. Stone, Harrisburg, Pa.

My Dear Governor,—Will you permit me to say that if it seems consistent for you to appoint Judge John Henderson, of Meadville, Pa., to the vacancy on the Supreme Bench caused by the death of Judge Green, it will be a matter of intense personal satisfaction to me. I am sure I need not occupy your time with any argument as to Judge Henderson's fitness, either as to character or legal qualification. With high regard, I am, very truly yours,

Jno. D. Archbold.

Both Judge Morrison and Judge Henderson were appointed to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and the former's familiarity with "oil and gas" no doubt proved acceptable to Mr. Archbold. We shall see hereafter that Mr. Archbold himself and other Standard Oil magnates had good reason to appreciate in the famous Buffalo refinery prosecution the advantage of having on the Bench a judge who was familiar with "oil and gas."

These strange letters did not disdain other rising members of the Bar. Here is a telegram and three letters addressed to the Hon. J. P. Elkin, Attorney-General of Pennsylvania—the officer whose duty it is to act as public prosecutor in his State in enforcing anti-trust legislation. Mr. Elkin's merits have since raised him also to the Bench of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania:—

26, Broadway, May 9, 1901.

My Dear General,—I enclose copy of a measure pending—I am not sure whether in the House or Senate. Being an act to amend an existing statute, as stated. For reasons which seem to us potent we would greatly like to have this proposed amendment killed. Won't you kindly tell me about it and advise me what you think the chances are?—Very truly yours,

Jno. D. Archbold.

To the Hon. John P. Elkin, Attorney-General, Harrisburg, Pa.

This is the sort of campaign the Standard Oil Trust has been carrying on in American Legislatures. How would the British people like it to be extended to the House of Commons?

Nobbling the Press.

Of course, in such a campaign of corruption the press is not overlooked. Here are three interesting letters which show how public opinion may be manufactured by that process:—

26, Broadway, October 10, 1902.

Mr. H. H. Edmonds, Baltimore, Md.

Dear Sir,—Responding to your favour of the 9th, it gives me pleasure to enclose you herewith certificate of deposit to your favour for $3,000, covering a year's subscription to the Manufacturers' Record.—Truly yours,

Jno. D. Archbold.

26, Broadway, January 17, 1899.

Hon. W. A. Magee, Pittsburg Times, Pittsburg, Pa.

Dear Sir,—As per understanding, herewith enclosed find certificate of deposit to your order for $1,250, the receipt of which kindly acknowledge.—Truly yours,

Jno. D. Archbold.

26, Broadway, December 18, 1901.

Mr. Thomas P. Grasty, care of Buck and Pratt, Room 1,203, 27, William Street, City.

Dear Mr. Grasty,—I have your favour of yesterday, and beg to return you herewith the telegram from Mr. Edmonds to you. We are willing to continue the subscription of $5,000 to the Southern Farm Magazine for another year, payments to be made the same as they have been this year. We do not doubt but that the influence of your publications throughout the South is of the most helpful character.

With good wishes, I am, very truly yours,

Jno. D. Archbold.

These sums are called "subscriptions," but their real character appears from the case of the Southern Farm Magazine, the price of which is 50 cents a year. Mr. Archbold was therefore "subscribing" for 10,000 years! We have only to remember that the anti-trust feeling is very strong in Texas and the other southern States to realise why the Standard Oil Trust was extending its patronage to the remote posterity of Mr. Thomas P. Crasty, that publicist of such a "helpful" character.

THE TRUST AND THE RAILROADS.

Origin of the Secret Rebate.

We will now go back to the story of the Standard's relations with the American railroads and the working of the secret rebate trick—the foundation-stone of the great monopoly.

The introduction of the secret railway rebate may or may not have been due to Mr. John D. Rockefeller's inventive genius—it is not absolutely proved to have been so—but the Report of the U.S. Government Commissioner of Corporations, Mr. J. R. Garfield, on the Transport of Petroleum, dated May 2, 1906, shows that at any rate the Standard Oil Company made the practice so much its own that it may fairly be regarded as its special system. On page 1 of the report this is made perfectly clear:—

The general result of the investigation has been to disclose the existence of numerous and flagrant discriminations by the railroads in behalf of the Standard Oil Company and its affiliated corporations. With comparatively few exceptions, mainly of other large concerns in California, the Standard has been the sole beneficiary of such discriminations.

Miss Tarbell says ("History of the Standard Oil Company," Vol. I., p. 33) that the Pennsylvania, Erie, and Central began as early as 1868 to use secret rebates on the published freight rates in oil as a means of securing traffic. This practice had gone on until in 1871 any big producer, refiner, or buyer could bully a freight agent into a special rate. Those "on the inside," those who had "pulls," also secured special rates. The result was that the open rate was enforced only on the innocent and weak.

Now, John D. Rockefeller first put money into the oil business in 1862, and went into it as his sole business in 1865. "Secret commission" frauds are naturally wrapped in obscurity for some time until they are discovered, or suspected, through their effects. Then they are liable to be imitated, when it is seen that they are a source of prosperity. Under these circumstances it is difficult to lay one's finger with absolute exactness on the originator of any special secret commission fraud, but Mr. J. D. Rockefeller is certainly "indicated" in the present instance.

The Railroads Conspirators.

Of course, it was just as iniquitous for an American railroad company, with its Government charter, to discriminate in favour of a large customer as it would be for an English one, or for a Government Department, say the Post Office, to sell stamps to a favoured few under their face value. The very secrecy with which the discrimination was invariably surrounded both by the railroads that granted it and the consignors who received it proves clearly that its illegality and injustice were recognised on both sides. It was only gradually that the matter of these secret rebates leaked out, about a couple of years before Mr. Rockefeller consolidated all his refining interests into the Standard Oil Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, where much of the oil-refining business was then carried on. This was in June, 1870. The capital of the new concern was $1,000,000, the parties interested in it at that date being John D. Rockefeller, Henry M. Flagler, Samuel Andrews, Stephen V. Harkness, and William Rockefeller. Before this time Rockefeller's striking success, which was at first attributed mainly to his extraordinary capacity for bargaining and borrowing, had not only attracted the attention of other Cleveland refiners, but raised their suspicion. They argued that they bought crude oil pretty nearly as cheaply as he, refined it as economically, and sold it at the same price. Yet they could not make money at anything like the same rate. There was only one explanation of it; he must be getting cheaper rates of transport from the railroads.

The Truth Leaks Out.

The matter was tested, and found to be so. Mr. Alexander, of the well-known refining firm of Alexander, Scofield, and Company, Cleveland, stated on oath before the Committee of Commerce of the United States House of Representatives in April, 1872, that in 1868 or 1869 he went to the Erie Railroad management and said: "You are giving others better rates than you are us. We cannot compete if you do that." The railroad agent, Mr. Alexander further testified, did not attempt to deny the allegation, but simply agreed to give Mr. Alexander a rebate also. This was 15 cents (7½d.) a barrel on the regular published rate of 40 cents (1s. 8d.) on all oil brought to Cleveland from the wells. A crude oil shipper, W. H. Doane, made a similar complaint, without mentioning names; and the complaint was stopped by a 10 cents (5d.) reduction per barrel. The method of granting these rebates was significant. The full published rate was paid as usual by the shipper, then at the end of each month, on forwarding vouchers for the amount of oil shipped, he received in cash from the railroad company his 15 cents or 10 cents rebate per barrel, as the case might be. This, I take it, was a precaution to conceal the granting of the rebate by keeping documentary evidence on hand that each shipper had duly paid the same fixed rate. If Messrs. Alexander and Doane, on receiving this excellent evidence of corrupt practice on the part of the railroad, had instituted a suit against it under the common law, subsequent history might have been different.

Qui s'Excuse, s'Accuse.

Later on, in 1880, General J. H. Devereux, who had granted secret rebates as vice-president of the Lake Shore Railroad in 1868, offered a defence of his conduct by means of an affidavit which he made in the case of the Standard Oil Company v. William C. Scofield et al. in the Court of Common Pleas, Cuyahoga County, Ohio, November 13, 1880. This affidavit states that "such rates and arrangements were made by the Pennsylvania Railroad that it was publicly proclaimed in the public print in Oil City, Titusville, and other places, that Cleveland was to be wiped out as a refining centre as with a sponge;" that the Cleveland refiners, some twenty-five in number, expressed their fears to him that they would have to give up their business in Cleveland; but that the Standard Oil Company made him a definite proposal to guarantee the Lake Shore Railroad a consignment of sixty carloads a day in return for a rebate of 10 cents on the 42 cents per barrel rate; and that, as this proposal "offered to the railroad company a larger measure of profit than would or could ensue from any business to be carried under the old arrangements," it was accepted by him. This was a pretty open confession. One might be permitted to think that, as the Lake Shore Railroad's profit and immunity from competition was thus secured, it would have been in a position to extend the reduced rate to the other refiners also, and thus carry out its duty as a "common" carrier. But it is obvious that it was the essence of its agreement with the Standard Oil Company to give that firm an advantage over its competitors. The cloven hoof is apparent in the excuse tacked on at the end of the affidavit that "this arrangement was at all times open to any and all parties who would secure or guarantee a like amount of traffic." It was certainly not open in the sense of being published; it was only avowed by the affidavit in 1880, when the unjust discrimination had worked long enough to set the Standard Oil Company definitely ahead of all competition. This affidavit made in defence of the railroad position is proof enough in itself of the fact that what the Standard Oil Company has aimed at from the beginning has been monopoly, and the killing off of competitors. Of any idea of fair play for all it is simply bereft.

How the Consumer Comes In.

It is one of the Standard Oil Company's most usual contentions that it has reduced the price of illuminating oil to the consumer. Any one who takes the trouble to study the matter from the beginning will see that the company's primary object, on which it concentrated all its early efforts, has always been to raise the price for the consumer. By 1870 the general competition among oilmen, together with the vast additional supplies of oil discovered, had brought prices down enormously since the time oil was first struck in 1859. Whereas Mr. Rockefeller had received on an average 58⅜ cents (2s. 5½d.) a gallon for the oil he exported in 1865, the year he went into business, in 1870 he received only 26⅜ cents (1s. 1¼d.). This was still high enough in all conscience for a wholesale price according to our twentieth century ideas, but in those days an oil-well was regarded as a kind of gold mine, and only colossal profits were looked on as at all "reasonable" by either producers or refiners. It was proved beyond doubt by competent testimony during the Missouri suit of the United States v. the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey that a wholesale price of 1 cent. (½d.) a gallon allows an excellent margin of profit for an oil refiner. But in 1870 everybody in the American oil trade simply despised an "honest livelihood." They were "out for the dollars," to use Mr. H. H. Rogers's expressive indication of his own intentions before the Industrial Commission in 1899. When Mr. J. J. Vandergrift, one of the Standard Oil directors, was questioned under oath as to what they meant to do, he replied, "Simply to hold up the price of oil—to get all we can for it." And Mr. Rogers declared to the Industrial Commission in 1875 that "oil to yield a fair profit should be sold for 25 cents per gallon!"

The South Improvement Company.

Prices being "ruinously low" from the oil-man's point of view, Mr. Rockefeller and his friends came forward with a scheme, in January, 1872, for the purpose of holding them up. They had originated the idea among themselves of the industrial "trust," and the date is consequently a momentous one in the world's commercial history. This, the first of all industrial trusts, was originally floated by taking over the charter of an existing company, the South Improvement Company, a name which had no earthly connection with that company's object, but was an excellent one for Mr. Rockefeller's purpose, as his object had to be strictly concealed in order to be workable. This object, as may be gathered from the text of the contract secretly signed by the company and the railroads on January 18, 1872, was to destroy the business of all others than itself who engaged at any time in the refining trade. There are two ways of distancing a competitor in a race—one by running faster, the other by tripping him up. Mr. Rockefeller proposed the latter method. But there was to be no clumsy fouling on the course, nothing to provoke comment from the grand-stand. The tripping, and any broken bones Providence might see good to permit as its consequence, was to be effected by a snare to be secretly laid by the railroads, who, without saying a word to any one, were to carry the South Improvement Company's products for such lower rates than those of other firms as would inevitably cause the latter to come a financial cropper. The consideration held out to the railroads for this service was an all-round rise in freight rates of about 100 per cent. and the abolition of competition among themselves by fixing the proportion of oil freight each road was to get, or to be paid for whether it got it or not. The discrimination in favour of the South Improvement Company was to be effected by a secret return to it of from 25 to 50 per cent. of all the money paid to the roads for oil freight either by itself or by any firm or company in the trade. How this iniquitous idea could ever have been developed, much less acted upon, it is difficult to imagine from a bald recital of the facts. But the railroads, I find from evidence before the Hepburn Committee in 1879, were either hoodwinked to believe, or affected to believe, that the South Improvement Company represented practically the whole oil trade, was the oil trade in fact; other firms were, or were to be regarded, as merely unrecognised, unqualified practitioners, who carried on their avocation at their own risk and peril, and whom society could not take into account in making its arrangements.

Robbery, not Trading.

Whatever the genesis of the idea, there could be no doubt as to its efficacy in disposing of a trade rival when reduced to practice. Suppose a competitor consigns as much freight as yourself, with a 50 per cent. rebate to you and a 50 per cent. drawback paid to you as an involuntary bounty by the competitor, you can regard a 100 per cent. rise in freight rates with equanimity, for it leaves your expenditure under this head exactly what it was before, to say nothing of the bounty, while your competitor pays exactly twice as much as he used to do. While in this position he can be reduced to a state of hopeless impotence by price-cutting, which can be effected at relatively small expense. On the supposition that the competitor's consignments bulk larger than yours, the bounty received from them becomes larger, till a point is arrived at when your own shipments cost you nothing at all, and you are in the enviable position not only of carrying on business without working expenses, but of being paid handsomely by your rivals for doing so. Something like this reductio ad absurdum in trading must have been actually approached in the case now under consideration, for as a matter of fact the South Improvement Company did not control one-tenth of the refining business of the United States when its contract was signed by and with the railroads on January 18, 1872. Mr. W. G. Warden, of Philadelphia, secretary of the South Improvement Company, admitted to the Congressional Investigating Committee which sat in March and April following that the aggregate refining business of the United States amounted to from 45,000 to 50,000 barrels daily capacity, while the stockholders of the South Improvement Company when formed owned a combined capacity of not over 4,600 barrels—less than one-tenth. This they increased, as we shall see, in three months' time, to a capacity of one-fifth.

The stockholders in the South Improvement Company held shares as follows—

Wm. Frew, W. P. Logan, and J. P. Logan, of Philadelphia, 10 shares each; Chas. Lockhart and Richard S. Waring, of Pittsburg, 10 shares each; W. G. Warden, of Philadelphia, and O. F. Waring, of Pittsburg, 475 shares each; Peter H. Watson, of Ashtabula, Ohio, 100 shares; H. M. Flagler, O. H. Payne, John D. Rockefeller and Wm. Rockefeller, of Cleveland, and J. A. Bostwick, of New York, 180 shares each; total, 2,000 shares of $100 each, of which the Standard Oil interests held 900. The contract was signed on behalf of the company by P. H. Watson, president, and on behalf of the railroads as follows:—Pennsylvania, J. Edgar Thompson, president; New York Central, Wm. H. Vanderbilt, vice-president; Erie, Jay Gould, president; Atlantic and Great Western, General Geo. B. McClellan.

The Sharing of the "Swag."

How completely the railroads were got to play the game of Mr. Rockefeller and his friends is made still more evident by two other clauses of the contract. The first is Section 8 of Art. 2, by which the railroads contracted to send each day to the South Improvement Company manifests on waybills of all petroleum shipped over the roads, which manifests shall state the name of the consignor, the place of shipment, the kind and actual quantity of the article shipped, the name of the consignee, and the place of destination, with the rate and gross amount of freight and charges.

This, of course, gave the South Improvement Company a full knowledge of everybody else's business—just what Mr. Rockefeller strove after from beginning to end of his career—and also ensured the due payment of the drawbacks by the roads. The other provision I refer to was contained in Art. 4, whereby each railroad was bound to co-operate as far as it legally might to maintain the business of the South Improvement Company against loss or injury by competition, to the end that it may keep up a remunerative and so a full and regular business, and to that end shall lower or raise the gross rates of transportation over its railroads and connections, as far as it legally may, for such times and to such extent as may be necessary to overcome such competition, the rebates and drawbacks to be varied pari passu with the gross rates.

This makes it clear that Art. 3, providing that rebates hereinbefore provided may be made to any other party who shall furnish an equal amount of transportation and who shall possess and use works, means, and facilities for carrying on and promoting the petroleum trade equal to those possessed and used by the South Improvement Company.

is a mere blind. The South Improvement Company was to be maintained at all costs and against all comers by whatever juggling with the rates should become necessary for the purpose.

In view of this set determination of the railroads, which was amply illustrated by their conduct in the sequel, it is natural to inquire a little more closely into the advantages that would accrue to them from the transaction, and which presumably formed a powerful enough inducement to make them sign the contract.

It was admitted by members of the South Improvement Company, who appeared before the Investigating Committee appointed by Congress in March, 1872, that the discrimination would have turned over to the company fully $6,000,000 (£1,200,000) annually on the carrying trade, while the railroads expected to make about $1,500,000 (£300,000) more than on the previously existing rates. The company would thus make four times as good a bargain as the railroads. It is difficult to see how shrewd business men like the railway directors could be led into a bargain in which they were so obviously bested. Another point the railroad directors had to consider in the interest of their shareholders was this. The avowed object of the South Improvement Company was to restrict the output of refined oil in order to raise its price. The interest of the railroads was obviously that the prices of oil should be kept low, so that the refiners would be compelled to ship the largest possible quantity. The interests of the shippers and of the railroads which received the shipments were thus diametrically opposed. The former wanted smaller consignments at higher prices, and the latter larger consignments at no matter what price. How the railroad officials could be induced to sign a contract binding them to help in the diminution of their own freights, it is difficult to see.

Was it Graft?

Mr. Frank Rockefeller, brother of John D. Rockefeller, testified before a Congressional Committee on July 7, 1876, that it was his impression that at the time the rebates went into a pool and were divided up between the Standard Oil Company and the railroad officials. He mentioned four of the latter by name, and two of them instantly sent a denial to the press. Mr. Frank Rockefeller's evidence—omitting the portion in which he mentions names—is reproduced in the late Mr. Rice's well-known pamphlet on the Standard Oil Railway Discriminations, p. 25, as follows:—

By the Chairman:

Q. What do you mean by the pool—a pool amongst the railroads or amongst the oil men?

A. I don't give this as a positive fact, but as I understand the arrangement, the New York Central, the Erie, the Atlantic and Great Western, the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati, and the Baltimore and Ohio roads have a pool—are combined for the purpose of shipping oil, and oil only—and in this pool the Baltimore and Ohio gets a certain number of barrels to go over its road, the Lake Shore so many to go over its road, and the Pennsylvania Company so many to go over its road, from different points in the country, and on the oil that is shipped over these roads by the pool and the Standard Oil Company there is a rebate or a drawback from the shipment of so much, which is put into this pool, over whichever road the oil may go, and that rebate is divided up between the Standard Oil Company and the railroad officials.

Q. The railroad officials, do you say?

A. So I understand it. I don't say that of my own knowledge.

Q. Then it does not go to the railroads themselves?

A. No, sir.

Q. But to the railroad officials?

A. To the railroad officials.

There the matter was left by the Committee of Congress, and there it must be left perforce. If the allegation is true, it would explain how the railroad directors could be induced to sign such a bad bargain for the railroads, and if false, it can presumably be refuted by an exhibition of the railroad accounts.

Mr. Rockefeller Goes Gunning.

The contract between the railroads and the South Improvement Company was at any rate signed, as I have said, and armed with this deadly weapon, Mr. Rockefeller went round to all the rival refineries in Cleveland and explained to their respective proprietors, gently but firmly, that they were as good as dead men in the oil trade, and that the only way they could avoid utter ruin was to turn over their refineries to the South Improvement Company either for stock or cash at the latter's valuation. It seems scarcely credible when related to men of a more stubborn mould, but it is an historical fact that no less than twenty out of these five-and-twenty Cleveland refiners—who, by the way, were approached one by one and under pledge of secrecy—as soon as they learnt that they were thus morally dead, proceeded at once to order their coffins. That is, they sold up as requested,—mostly for the bit of cash Mr. Rockefeller was inclined to give them. Was there ever such a piece of successful bluff in the history of the world? For a parallel I can only think of the American story of the colonel who was such a dead shot that, as soon as he raised his rifle, the 'possums just climbed down without waiting for the discharge. The Cleveland refiners fell at Mr. Rockefeller's feet through sheer fright, and thus in less than three months' time the Standard Oil group absorbed twenty other refineries and increased its capacity from 1,500 barrels a day to 10,000 barrels—from one-tenth to one-fifth the total capacity of the United States.

Mr. Rockefeller's Duplicity.

Of course, the murder was soon out, and the Oil Regions, which were interested in oil wells as distinct from refining, which was the Standard's business, were aflame with indignation. A Petroleum Producers' Union was formed in opposition. Mass meetings were held and Congress was petitioned. The Pennsylvania Legislature repealed the charter of the South Improvement Company, and on March 25 the peccant railroads signed a contract with the Petroleum Producers' Union, of which the first and chief clause provided

That all arrangements for the transportation of oil after this date shall be upon a basis of perfect equality to all shippers, producers, and refiners, and that no rebates, drawbacks, or other arrangements of any character shall be made or allowed that will give any party the slightest difference in rates or discrimination of any character whatever.

On April 4—observe these dates; they are important—General McClellan (Atlantic and Great Western), Horace F. Clark (Lake Shore and Michigan Southern), Thomas A. Scott (Pennsylvania), and W. H. Vanderbilt (New York Central) all sent emphatic messages to the Petroleum Producers' Union declaring that their roads had no understanding of any nature in regard to freights with the Standard Oil Company. On April 8 John D. Rockefeller telegraphed to the Petroleum Producers' Union: "In answer to your telegram, this company holds no contract with the railroad companies or any of them or with the South Improvement Company." Yet we now know from a contract thoughtlessly exhibited by H. M. Flagler seven years later to a Commission of the Ohio State Legislature, a contract between his company and the railroads, that a rate had been fixed "From April 1 until the middle of November, 1872, about seven months, $1.25." Now the corresponding rate openly published and recorded in the contract between the roads and the Petroleum Producers' Union just quoted, which was signed March 25, was $1.50. A rebate of 16⅔ per cent.! Mr. Rockefeller had it all the time, in spite of his own assertions and those of the railroad officials to the contrary.

Mr. Rockefeller's Indiscretion.

Mr. Rockefeller has committed very few indiscretions in his lifetime, but he did achieve one at this early date in his career. He talked under the smart of his defeat, and so did others of his colleagues in the late South Improvement Company. He was reported in the Oil City Derrick to have said to a prominent man of Oil City that the South Improvement Company could work under the charter of the Standard Oil Company, and to have added that in less than two months his auditor would be glad to join him. One of his colleagues simply said: "The business now will be done by the Standard Oil Company. . . . We mean to show the world that the South Improvement Company was organised for business, and means business, in spite of opposition." This went the round of the American press a few days after the repeal of the charter, and since then to the present day the indiscreetly uttered threat has been stealthily fulfilled to the letter. The South Improvement Company was formally dissolved in order to calm the popular indignation, but the same men continued to operate through the Standard Oil Company of Cleveland, and, as we have seen, to receive similar rebates, which enabled them to build up the Standard Oil Trust. Even as late as May, 1906, the Garfield Report states (p. xxi.): "The Standard Oil Company has habitually received from the railroads, and is now receiving, secret rates and other unjust and illegal discriminations." On May 3, 1910—to bring the matter well down to date by a concrete instance—the United States Court of Appeal confirmed a decree of the Circuit Court of the Western District of New York State fining the Standard Oil Company $20,000 (£4,000) "for accepting concessions from the published rate of the Pennsylvania, New York Central, and Rutland Railroads in violation of Inter-State Commercial Law." But the fine, of course, is an ineffective flea-bite, and is only worth quoting to show that the iniquitous conspiracy of injustice and robbery entered into by the railroads and the Standard Oil Trust in 1872 still continues to baffle justice in America and to outrage the moral sense of the civilised world.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S ENGAGEMENT.

As so many persons seem interested in the engagement of the Bonapartist Pretender and the Princesse Clémentine of Belgium, I now deal with it. The hopes of his party seem to me ill-placed. The Princesse is thickly gilded, they say, and she may hope for her present fortune to be greatly increased when all the affairs relating to her father's estate are liquidated. But it is not now the way of pretenders to squander their own or their wives' fortunes on hazardous restoration enterprises. Directly the Comte de Chambord married a Hapsburg Este Archduchess with what was for her time a singularly handsome dowry, he became less militant, and contented himself with leaving his political destiny to his most trusted followers, to France, and to God. If God wanted him He could sound the hour. If France wanted him she must say so with a unanimous voice. He would then return at the head of the faithful little band. Meanwhile he led the life of a country gentleman fond of shooting, and was counted one of the best shots in the Austrian Empire.

Marriage with the sister of the Comtesse de Chambord completely tamed the fighting and conspiring ardour of Don Juan, grandfather of Don Jaime. The late Don Carlos only followed the example of his uncle, the Comte de Chambord, in leaving his cause to God and the Spanish nation on coming into large shares of the fortunes of his mother, the Archduchess Beatrice of Hapsburg Este, and of the Comtesse de Chambord. As soon as the first Don Miguel had married off brilliantly his five daughters and found a rich wife for his son, he became a slothful Pretender. I always thought the Comte de Paris too rich ever to be a successful one. The two great examples of splendid success as Pretenders are to be found in the lives of the Merry Monarch and of Louis Napoleon. Charles at Breda and Louis Napoleon in London were almost penniless. Louis Blanc, a cousin of the latter and his friend almost up to the date of the Coup d'Etat, told me that when he was an exile in London he asked him whether he could not obtain, through his good offices, a ticket for a debate in the House of Commons. The exiled Prince brought him the ticket next day. Louis Blanc afterwards learned that he spent his last guinea on cabs in going about to try for the ticket. Had not Louis Napoleon gone to the Elysée, he would have been lodged in the Clichy prison as a defaulting debtor.

In publishing the marriage banns of Prince Victor Napoleon and the Princesse Clémentine, the French Consul in Brussels withholds the style of Imperial Highness from the former. He acts on an order received from Paris. Victor, it is true, was born with an Imperial rank in a third degree. But jurists hold that the vote of the Sovereign Assembly at Bordeaux to sweep away the Empire left him without this birthright. It would, besides, be very inconvenient for the French Ambassador at Court functions in Brussels to find an Imperial Highness entitled to precede him. The Princess, of course, will remain a Royal Highness. But s— and her husband must be debarred from entering together at State receptions. King Albert, or his cousin the King of Italy, can in private give him any protocular standing that he and his wife crave for.

Prince Napoleon used to be "Prince Victor" in the lifetime of the first King of Italy. When the late M. Paul de Cassagnac set him on to revolt against his father, the legendary Plon Plon, he took the opposition name or title of "Prince Napoleon," and has ever since gone by it. He has kept up, miraculously, one might say, a fairly good style of living in the Avenue Louise, surrounded by family relics, and affording himself a few park hacks and a neat brougham. Until he became engaged to King Leopold's daughter, a lady shared his exile from the beginning. There were children in the house, in whom he and she took a parental interest. The latter do not seem to have been recognised, as French law allows, by the engaged pair. He is fifty-eight, not of a clean build, and resembles in features and eyes—the latter in shape and fixity of gaze only—the Princess Clotilde, his mother. The make-up and pose are Napoleonic, and give him un faux air not in keeping with his prosaic and rather unpretentious character. He drinks Belgian faro beer, thinks beer, and shows beer in his fleshiness. King Leopold kept his daughter out of his way. The acquaintance began accidentally on the road from Laeken to the château where the Archduchess Max (Charlotte of Belgium) has lived so long as a lunatic under keepers. The Princess took her daily, in the springtime, in a dog-cart that she drove herself, a sheaf of field flowers. One day the sheaf fell on the road. A cyclist jumped from his machine to pick it up and bring it to the lady driving the little trap. Doubtless he knew her by appearance, for he did so cap in hand and with a very low bow. Their eyes met, and they two ever after understood each other. She asked, "Whom am I to thank?" "Prince Napoleon." She had not yet had an establishment of her own, and she found she must not think of seeing the Prince at Laeken. Means were found to know beforehand when he intended to pay visits to the Comtesse de Flandre, his connection, but no blood relation.

The Princess, who felt her youth fast fleeting, became impatient for marriage, and conveyed this state of mind to the King, who learned of it with furious anger. He thought of marrying her to the King of Bulgaria, but her imagination had been taken by the Napoleonic legend, which transformed in her eyes her Prince into a glorious being. As she is just as obstinate as her father, he could not drive her from her determination. And so she, being her own mistress, makes a love match at the age of thirty-eight.

Seventeen years ago she used to be nice-looking on horseback, but was too tall when on foot. I thought one day, as she rose from a bench at Spa, that she would never stop rising. She is said to have the same number of inches as the late King Leopold. Had her face been moulded in a cast of his, it could not have resembled it more closely. Her blue eyes had the same Louise Philippe shape, and a curious glitter that hardly denoted romantic suavity. She had a large allowance for her personal expenses, and spent heavily on dress, but always in Brussels. Paris she held to be too dear. When she decided to live no longer at Laeken Palace, Leopold gave her, in the park over the way, where a gigantic statue of his father stands, the Trianon of the Archduchess Christine, Governor of Belgium and sister of Marie Antoinette. He had it fitted up with eighteenth-century elegance, up-to-date comfort, and with flower and kitchen gardens, hot houses and conservatories. Fifteen servants were not thought too many by him. But the luxurious comfort palled on the Princess. When she drove out people said how old she had become. They pitied her for being crossed in love. The mouth had never been a pouting one. It grew contracted, marked with lines of discontent, and seemed to sink. At the age of twenty she had a strong inclination for a religious life in a convent, or béguinage. It followed the fire at Laeken Palace, in which her governess perished. She will, therefore, be able to appreciate the saintly life led by Prince Napoleon's mother among the poor of Montcalieri.

M. Pichon appreciates the interdiction by the King of Italy of a "manifestation" wedding at Montcalieri. No French person outside of the immediate family of the bridegroom is to be invited. The press is utterly excluded. The ceremony is to be in the little oratory of Queen Adelaide of Sardinia, where there is barely room enough for the altar service, the bridegroom's brother and mother, the happy pair, and their witnesses. The Princesse Clotilde hears Mass in this oratory every morning.

And so Mme. Judith Gautier, the eldest of Théophile Gautier's three daughters, is now a member of the Academy—not of the Forty, but the Ten—founded by Goncourt. It gives her a rather handsome income, and is a fine literary feather in her cap. This election, entirely managed by M. Lucien Decave, author of "Sous-Offs" and other military books, makes her the colleague of nine highly accomplished authors. M. Decave pitted Mme. Judith Gautier against M. Claudel, a symbolist, now Consul of France at Prague. Symbolism is no longer in vogue, and les absents ont toujours tort. M. Paul Margueritte did not attend the fraternal restaurant déjeuner at the close of which the ballot took place. As her father's daughter, Mme. Gautier had a sort of claim to the suffrages of the Goncourt Academy. She had a very real claim as a woman of considerable talent, who respects her pen, has lived by it, has known how to prepare with dignity for the approach of the elderly or old time of life, has lived for years in retirement, never seeking opportunities for self-advertisement, and keeping out of the herd of literary ladies who used to clamour round M. Briand for the red ribbon—or, at least, the palms of the Academy.

If I do not care for the subjects of her books, and am repelled by an abnormal something in them, I think that in regard to literary workmanship, or métier, she is second to none. Her books present an analogy to the pictorial works of Jules Lefevre, now to be seen in the museum called after him in the Rue de La Rouchefoucauld. Some of his paintings resemble enamels of extraordinary perfection. They are singularly fascinating. Without knowing anything of ancient Greece or Hellenic countries, he was a Hellenist, as Mme. Judith Gautier is a Chinese or a Japanese without having ever been to China or Japan. Loti was in the same way a painter of the Icelandic seas that he never sailed in. But if she wrote conjointly with Loti "La Fille au Ciel," she is nearer as a writer to M. Gustave Geoffroy, formerly of La Justice, and now Director of the Gobelins; and I think she can do more as a painter with words than that very artistic writer. She began her literary career on leaving school, and under the name of Judith Walter, with an article on the "Eureka" of Poe, learned Chinese rapidly from an unfortunate Celestial whom Théophile Gautier picked up somewhere in a miserable condition and took to his home to do there what he best could to earn a living. At the age of sixteen Judith published "La Terre de Jade," and soon after doing so married Catulle Mendès, the poet. She must have been still in her teens when she brought out her best chinoiserie, "Le Dragon Impérial," which appeared first as a feuilleton and then in a volume. At about the same time Catulle Mendès formed a liaison with a young musician whom Wagner had deserted, in whom Henri Regnault, the painter (killed in the St. Cloud sortie of January, 1871), saw the muse of heroic opera. Judith Gautier cast off the marital name, to be thenceforth known by the paternal one. The better to write she worked hard as a painter and sculptor, and led the free life of a literary woman standing alone. What I thought greatly to her honour was that the few jewels she wore were remarkable not for costliness, but merely for the taste they showed. She would have done better had she not in a measure became absorbed in Liszt, Wagner, and other "musicians of the future." One saw her at all the Wagner celebrations at Bayreuth. Her fervour did not abate when Catulle Mendès became the chief apostle of Wagnerism in France.

Judith Gautier inherited her marvellous beauty from the Grisi family, Carlotta Grisi, the dancer, being her mother. She could not have had a more purely classical head and figure than Nature gave her when I first saw her. The contour of the cheeks of the purest oval surpassed anything a sculptor could produce, so beautiful was the texture of the flesh, so rare the pale tea rose yellow of the cheeks, so fine the deeply-dark eyes—generally sombre in their hue until she conversed, when a Frenchwoman's wit made them twinkle prettily. Her mass of black hair the coiffeur found unmanageable when she asked for his help to dress it, which she seldom did. I cannot remember a plastic or other defect on which one could lay one's finger. She was very unaffected, with quiet manners, and yet something when in literary or artistic company that encouraged one to think her bon camarade. She went to every première at the theatres as a critic, and to the Salon as art feuilletonist to the Rappel in the time of Victor Hugo. But the editors of all the papers, knowing that she held in horror what she called rastaquouère publicity, never brought her into their tout Paris lists. I believe that if one searched in all the papers for the last thirty-five years one could not find her name save at the foot of feuilletons or in the notices of new books and an occasional play. She also brought out at the Odéon under Porel's management "La Marchande de Bonheur," a chinoiserie replete with Celestial colour and gracious fancy.

Mme. Judith Gautier has through most of those years lived in the retired Cité des Ternes, a tiny city of villas, each in its own garden with a tiny square in the centre and a common entrance kept by a concierge. She called her part of a villa her hermitage, for she had no "day for visitors," and received very few calls. How could she, an ardent worshipper of all the muses, find time for idle chit-chat? The workroom, at once studio, music-room, and study, was furnished in a style so congenial to Loti that he borrowed it for his house at La Rochelle. It was very Far Eastern. The stuffs an ordinary beauty would have worn Mme. Gautier arranges as wall and furniture draperies. This académicienne initiated the fashion of Liberty satins, which, trimmed with gold cord or lace, went so well with her perfect beauty. She nothing less than loathes ladies' newspapers, and differs from all her academical electors in not being a feminist. But she vows she will not consider the sex of any writer competing for a Goncourt prize.

In common with Mme. Blanche Pierson, Judith Gautier knows how to look approaching old age in the face. She keeps company now, through the medium of her piano, with the great soul of Beethoven. This season she will bring out at the Opéra Comique "La Sonate de Clair de Lune," dealing with a delicate amorous adventure of that grand genius. The score is by Benedictius.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE English may now be divided, dear Lady Betty, into men, women, and suffragettes. It is the curious ambition of the last that they wish to abandon some of the advantages of woman to adopt many of the disadvantages of man.

"Abou ben Adhem—may his tribe increase—Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace."

The present writer awoke one night from a dream which was seriously disquieting. According to it woman had replaced man in Parliament; the existing Ministers retained office, but had been transformed into women. The chief members of the Government were:—

Prime Minister.....Birdie Asquith.
Chancellor of the Exchequer...Tottie Lloyd George.
Lord High Chancellor.....Flossie Loreburn.
Secretary for War.....Tiny Haldane.
Home Secretary.....Daisy Churchill.
Secretary for Ireland.....Baby Birrell.

The Leader of the Opposition was Dolly Balfour, whilst Trixie Rosebery contrived with remarkable ingenuity to so invariably disagree with every variety of opinion that nothing but the "lonely furrow" was possible for the brilliant inopportunist.

* * * * * *

The shopkeeper is replacing the squire. Put tersely that is one of the chief features of the financial development of the time. The bulk of the capital of this country is no longer in the soil; it is in the street.

The capital represented by the combined trading establishments of Bond Street, for instance, greatly exceeds probably the wealth of the whole landed interest, say, in Wiltshire, and street by street in London alone may be compared with the remaining counties with the same result. Then there will be thousands of thoroughfares left here and in the provincial towns together providing an overwhelming surplus.

The impoverished peer now with difficulty maintains himself and his wife and children in the conditions suitable to the social position they occupy. The collaterals of the family can no longer depend upon him for assistance in an emergency, nor can he obtain employment for them under the State, as was easy in former times.

Altogether different is it with most of the members of the "middle" and "upper-lower" classes. Smith is to succeed to a great business; Brown is the favourite of a rich uncle in the City; Jones is employed by a cousin, a manufacturer, with the prospect of obtaining a partnership if his ability warrants the promotion; Robinson has connections in some colony who will facilitate matters for him there if he emigrates.

Every avenue to prosperity is being rapidly closed to the impecunious "upper-class" men, and in desperation they clamour for compulsory service, which will increase the demand for officers, and for war, which may lead to promotion.

London is popularly supposed to be paved with gold; it might more accurately be described as paved with associations. One of the principal authorities on London greatly regretted in his old age that he had devoted much time to the study of a district instead of confining his attention to the history of a single street.

That King Edward the Seventh was much attached to London and to all concerned with its past is well known. To perpetuate the memory of his late Majesty by establishing a Museum of London would therefore be especially appropriate. Lord Esher and Mr. Lewis Harcourt, the First Commissioner of Works, are endeavouring to obtain the sanction of the London Memorial Committee to establish such a museum in commemoration of King Edward, and the proposal will unquestionably have the approval of most Londoners and of the country.

The Carnavalet Museum, which is now one of the most interesting, useful, and popular institutions in Paris, was founded to preserve in one building all available objects connected with the history of that city. That London with its wealth of historical associations and of relics of the past should be without such an institution is inexplicable. It is earnestly to be hoped that the opportunity which has now occurred will not be missed.

In "The Romance of Princess Amelia," a volume which will be published this week by Eveleigh Nash, Mr. William Childe-Pemberton will afford the public the first opportunity accorded to it of ascertaining the real facts concerning the much-misrepresented Princess. To Mr. Childe-Pemberton were entrusted by the late Mrs. William Lowther the hitherto unpublished letters and papers the contents of which enable the much-tangled story to be at length unravelled. The author has, moreover, had the advantage of having access to the important documents in the possession of Mrs. Ernest Farquhar and of Mrs. Boyle, the latter the talented "E. V. ## CORRESPONDENCE.

FORTUNE-HUNTING PARSONS.

SIR,—For many years I have been a reader of your paper, which I pay for and do not get sent me, and have found you fair. May I be allowed to say with regard to the letter in your last issue, headed "Fortune-hunting Parsons," that I have been a clergyman for thirty years, and have not met one curate who has married a well-to-do spinster before he was forty, and then retired from the active exercise of his profession? Layman says the "number is large" and "no other profession can show anything at all like it." Naturally we clergy know more about one another than laymen know of us, and if the number of these well-to-do spinster married curates is so large, it is odd that during an experience of thirty years I should not have met one. "Layman" says he has met two "who may be fairly suspected" of this fortune hunting. Suspected by whom?—Yours obediently,

A PARSON.

"WESTERN MEN AND EASTERN MORALS."

SIR,—Before closing your discussion on "Western Men and Eastern Morals" will you allow a mother of men to say a few words? The companies have been blamed for not paying their young men sufficient to marry upon, and the young men have been blamed for giving way to their baser instincts, but what about the wives who wilfully stay in England and decline to join their husbands abroad? Are they not considerably to blame for much of the sin that goes on? How often in my long married life have I heard women say, "Oh, no; I can't go out to so and so; it's such a hot climate, and he gets along very well without me!" Some even go so far as to add "the doctor says I really ought not to risk going."

How much better it would be if doctors urged them to rejoin their husbands and not think about the climate! I am quite sure a great deal of harm is done by failure of duty in this respect on the part of women. It may possibly have been from ignorance. But now that this unpleasant subject has been publicly discussed in your world-read paper, I hope wives will seriously consider the duties they owe to the men they have married.—Yours,

AN OLD MOTHER.

SIR,—"F. W. D." and others are mistaken in supposing that I wish to prove that continence is impossible for Europeans living in the East. I was careful to say that I did not consider it so. What I did say was that for the majority of young Englishmen, especially those isolated in the jungle, it is a counsel of perfection, or at any rate extremely difficult.

Self-control is as much a virtue in the East as anywhere. But when the practice of this virtue entails a young man's complete isolation from the only available human companionship (and this is what it does mean if he is alone in the jungle), then, virtue though it be, it may be purchased at too high a price.

It is not vice, but the natural craving for cheerful companionship which is at the bottom of most of these "temporary marriages" in the East.—Your obedient servant,

EX ORIENTE.

DEAR TRUTH,—I have read the articles in your paper of August 10 and 17, and what surprises me is the apparent innocence of you English people displayed therein. What you complain of in Burma has existed in certain parts of this country (South Africa) for centuries. It started in and about Cape Town in the seventeenth century, when slavery was well in vogue. It was a common practice for European masters to have children by their female slaves, and many such children are the ancestors of our colonial aristocracy. These slaves were Hottentots, and their features are different from those of members of the Anglo-Saxon race. The predominant features of the Hottentot are large flat nose, pronounced cheeks, and large mouth, with protruding lips, yellow skin, and woolly hair. These features are to-day recast in many of our colonial people, especially those coming from in and around Cape Town. You will recollect the Huguenots from France fled to Holland, and subsequently to different parts of the world, including this colony. Now, colonials with these features, in order to disguise their true origin, regard themselves as the offspring of these Huguenots, who had very dark complexions and jet-black hair, but not the other Hottentot features.

I am living on the borders of the Transkei, which is the native territories or Kaffirland proper. There what you complain of in Burma is common. Almost every European trader there has a Kaffir girl who is his metcha or concubine. They have children by these women. Now, such a state of things can't be wondered at in the Transkei, as it is a very densely populated native country, with but few Europeans, who are only officials and traders, and who, I suppose, find it lonely, and are, therefore, driven to consort with blacks. If one is in such a country for many years, meeting few Europeans and coming daily in contact with natives, whose language, ways, and habits you acquire, no other result can be wondered at.

The same state of affairs exists in Rhodesia, and even more so. It is not regarded as a sin or a crime, and, though not done openly, it is known to exist, and the parties are not ostracised or banished from society.

The only inconsistency that I complain of is the outcry raised when a black man dares to consort with a white woman. The white man here (from England and elsewhere) contaminates the native women, and so he should not complain if, in course of time, the black man retaliates. The native who is still uncivilised is like a child who, if improperly taught, will be troublesome in the future, and the white man only will be to blame for the result. In order to avoid trouble with the black man here we Europeans must teach him to respect as well as submit to the white man. I don't mean in the sense of slavery. Let the native be respectful and obedient to the white man, who, in turn, must treat him fairly, and all will end well. But how is this going to be achieved when the native is put on a plane of equality with the white by European men cohabiting with native women?

The poor native, I fear, would have been better in his raw state. The European has contaminated him in every respect. In his kraal, where he goes about in his blanket, the native is a fine specimen of man, but as soon as he comes in contact with the European he seems to degenerate. The consumption scourge amongst natives here is terrible, but the Government is calmly looking on and doing nothing. I once discussed the subject with a well-known doctor here, and he said: "Leave them alone. They breed too fast. Consumption will thin them out, and in time we will be rid of them." The native is simply regarded as a chattel to be exploited for all he is worth; in fact, there is no European here who is not, directly or indirectly, dependent on him. The native man is good enough for the white man to make money out of and the native woman for him to satisfy his lust with; but the native's welfare is not considered worth troubling about, and the white man recognises no responsibilities for his condition, physical or moral.—Your faithfully, L.

THE FALL IN CONSOLS.

THE topic of the week has been the further fall in Consols to below 80. The drop attracted special attention because an idea had hitherto been abroad that the banks and other large holders of Consols would make an organised attempt to put in the peg at 80 in order to avoid a further writing down of their holdings. The reasons for the long decline in Consols have so frequently been discussed in these columns and elsewhere that I should not dwell upon them now but for the misleading statements made either through ignorance or political prejudice by certain writers in the press. In normal circumstances a fall in the Funds would be a legitimate weapon of offence for the opponents of the Government. But for over thirty years past British Consols have been no true barometer of the nation's credit. For some years, both before and after the Goschen Conversion Act of 1888, the price was gradually forced up by enormous purchases on the part of the Government for account of the Post Office Savings Bank. These huge purchases, coupled with the small field then open to investors restricted by the Trustee Act, and the fact that the Baring crisis of 1890 for a time shook the faith of the public in foreign investments, caused a famine in Consols and kindred securities, and for a time more than offset the reduction made in the interest rate after 1888.

But since 1897 Consols have been a steadily falling market. The fact that during this period of thirteen years the Unionists held office for eight years during which Consols fell 20 per cent., and the Liberals have been in power for five years, during which Consols have fallen a further 10 per cent., alone suggests that the drop in the Funds is a two-edged weapon for either party to use against its political foes. Further investigation shows that it has very little, if any, right to be used as a party weapon at all. Since 1897 we have had two costly wars, both financed in the main by this country, and one of which added enormously to our funded and floating debt. We have seen the coming into operation of Mr. Chamberlain's Colonial Stock Act of 1900, which at a stroke of the pen, as it were, widened the area available for trustees by the huge sum of £600,000,000—a total that has been rapidly growing ever since. The run of world-wide peace that has followed the settlements in South Africa and the Far East has been marked by a world-wide expansion in State borrowing and joint stock enterprise, and investors have had opportunities offered them for the profitable employment of capital on a scale never seen before. Now, consider what bearing these factors have upon Consols. Buoyed up by the temporary action of enormous Government purchases for Savings Bank account before the war, the Funds since have not only been robbed of this support, but circumstances have combined to alienate the support of the private investor. The trustee who formerly was compelled to put the funds at his disposal into Consols or kindred stocks now seeks the higher yield offered upon Colonial securities—only the other day a large trustee said to me, "We daren't nowadays buy Consols; if we do the beneficiaries charge us with robbing them of 10s. per cent." As for the investor not restricted in his choice by the provisions of the Trustee Act, he, offered on all hands securities that return 3½ to something over that he regards as safe, scarcely ever thinks of buying Consols. For some years, then, the Consols Market has been what the dealers call an "all-one-way" market, and, as I have shown, for reasons altogether outside the domain of party politics.

Viewed in the light of the events of the past decade it must be admitted that the prospects of any material recovery in Consols are not good. The more one studies the matter the more convinced he will become that the Goschen Conversion Act was a mistake. True, the Colonial Stock Act, which has been one of the prime factors in bringing down Consols, had not been mooted when the late Viscount Goschen propounded his scheme for the scaling down of interest, but what was there beyond a pious hope for believing in 1888 that the credit of the British nation could be raised to a 2½ per cent. standard? The present price of 2½ per cent. Consols is, say, 79; the equivalent price of a 3 per cent. stock would be 95. Now, taking the period from 1840 to the present time, Consols have in only eleven years out of seventy attained an average price of above par, and this includes the six years 1894 to 1899, which were admittedly years of inflation. Taking the period 1835-1874, the average price, according to Mr. A. H. Gibson, in his book on "Bank Rate," was 93, so that at the present moment Consols, after their continuous decline, extending over thirteen years, still stand at the equivalent of two points above the mean level of a period of forty years. This is a hard fact which suggests that, while the fall in the Funds may have pretty well run its course, there is small possibility, without some adventitious aid, such as a big augmentation of the Sinking Fund, of any material rally. It really looks as if sooner or later the Government will have to return to the sweet simplicity of 3 per cent.

Admitting that the Goschen Conversion Act was a mistake, it is a great pity that the Government cannot rectify it—and thus repair the hardship wrought to many of its creditors—by simply paying 3 per cent. in future instead of 2½. The obvious impracticability of such a course, however, lies in the fact that since the scaling down of interest was first effected Consols have in numberless cases changed ownership and many present holders must have purchased at under 95. To raise the interest rate therefore by ½ per cent., which would automatically lift the price from 79 to 95, would be to give in many cases a bonus to buyers that rightfully belonged to the sellers. A scheme for the reconversion of Consols that at least had the merit of practicability was that of Mr. Mackworth Praed. His proposal was that a new stock carrying interest at 3 per cent. should be created ranking pari passu with the present 2½ per cent. Consols, to the holders of which should be given the option of exchanging £100 of their 2½ per cent. stock for £87 10s. of the new 3 per cent. stock. As on a strict parity basis £100 of 2½ per cent. stock is the equal of only £83 6s. 8d. of 3 per cent. stock, such a proposal would be sufficiently attractive to be a success, and it certainly would be desirable to see the standard stock of the nation again standing somewhere near par. But whether either party will have the courage to bring forward a proposal which may stamp it, however unjustly, as the party which cut down debt without repaying it, is open to doubt. Probably matters will be allowed to drift until 1923, when the Government's option to redeem Consols comes into force, and provides Ministers with some excuse for tackling a conversion scheme.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

Markets Mostly Steady to Firm—The Wonderful Strength of Yankees—Havanas and the Cyclone.

Speaking generally, the Stock Markets last week were steady to firm in tone. A good effect was produced by the news of large prospective additions to the Bank of England's gold stock. The fear of a 6 per cent. Bank rate appears now to be a thing of the past. Americans again were the strongest market, and although the "bull" party was inclined to slow down towards the end of the week, being influenced by the fact that the elections are now almost here, prices kept up in wonderful fashion. A helpful factor was the fine showing made by the Union Pacific for the year ended June 30. The report displays earnings equal to over 19 per cent., as compared with the 10 per cent at present being distributed. The statement of the United States Steel Corporation for the September quarter was not a good one, earnings at $37,365,000 being nearly $3,000,000 less than those for the June quarter. But the figures failed to ruffle the market, which declares that it is discounting the period of greater prosperity it professes to see ahead. In the Cuban railway group United of Havanas rallied upon a reassuring cable relating to the damage done by the cyclone. The manager states that he does not think it necessary to reduce his early estimate of a 600,000-ton sugar crop by more than 4 per cent.

RAILWAYS.

Trunks and the Meeting—Labour's Growing Demands—The Current Financial Position—Bearer Certificates.

The market for Grand Trunk Railway stocks got cold comfort from the half-yearly meeting. Mr. A. W. Smithers, the chairman, cannot be called a pessimist; indeed, his remarks looked at broadly were permeated with robust optimism. But his plain speaking about the continuous rise in the company's working expenses, due mainly to increased wages, served as a damper to the dividend hopes of the junior stockholders. Mr. Smithers pointed out that since 1897 the wages paid by the Grand Trunk had risen 35 to 55 per cent., and conditions of labour as to time and amount of work had greatly improved; yet the return on the capital at present in receipt of dividends, after many years of intermittent and uncertain dividends, to-day amounted only to a little over 4 per cent., and the large portion of the capital represented by the Third Preference and Ordinary stocks received no dividend at all. The recent settlement with the men, following the strike, would entail an immediate addition to the pay roll of £120,000 per annum, and later on the amount will be automatically increased. These facts constitute a good primâ facie case for higher freight rates, a matter which is evidently engaging the serious considerations of the management.

As regards the immediate outlook, the company started the current half-year £63,000 better off owing to the payment of the second preference dividend out of the profits of the June period. But it has since made no headway. Net profits on the combined system for the three months ended September 30 show a decline of £60,000, or of £20,000 excluding the Western branch, the earnings of which do not directly bear upon the dividends of the parent company. Thus the position down to September 30 is that the Grand Trunk has a sum of only £40,000 more available for dividend than was the case a year ago. True, the company has been hampered by a strike, which check to progress should not occur in the final quarter of the year. But the disappointing thing to the "bull" party is that so far no relief has been shown from the virtual elimination of the Engine and Car Renewal Suspense Account. In the December half of 1909 the company appropriated £259,000 from revenue towards writing down this account, and at June 30 last only £75,000 had to be found in order to extinguish the item altogether. If therefore the proportionate amount required for suspense account were written off monthly in this and the corresponding half-years, it was reasonable for the shareholders to expect better things. The fact, however, that the expenses have risen instead of fallen suggests that allowances upon renewals are still on a heavy scale, and unless a distinct change occurs in the situation in the closing months of the year, the dividend outlook for the third preference stockholders is hardly rosy. There is no fear of the Grand Trunk Company becoming liable just yet under its guarantees to the Pacific road, for, as the chairman pointed out the other day, until the new line was properly connected with the East, it was impossible to work it on a commercial basis, and the service would still be charged to construction account. A matter that has been welcomed by the Ordinary stockholders is the proposal to exchange the present registered stock for bearer certificates to those stockholders who wished for the exchange. This step, which will be adopted as soon as the necessary powers have been obtained, will in time make for a wider market for the Ordinary stock, as the dealing in bearer scrip will encourage dealings on the Continent as well as in the States and Canada.

Buenos Ayres and Pacific Results—A Reassuring Report.

The results of the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway for the year ended June 30 give cause for negative satisfaction. The company has had to reduce its ordinary dividend from 5 per cent. to 3 per cent. (which compares against 7 per cent. two years ago). This is not pleasant, but some consolation is to be found in the fact that the 3 per cent. has been earned without dipping into reserve funds, which could not be said a year ago. Further, the cause of the drop in the dividend is entirely due to the rapid growth of new capital charges, and not to any halt in the progress of the company as a revenue producer. Gross receipts from the whole of the traffic carried increased by £159,945, and allowing for a drop in the carriage of the company's own traffic (which is conveyed at cost), the advance in the remunerative traffic was no less than £412,029. This, in a year of bad crops, affords solid ground for satisfaction. Working expenses were reduced £110,690, and the net receipts showed an advance of £270,635. Net revenue credits, however, declined £119,042, mainly owing to the fact that nothing was taken from reserve this year, and the total net revenue, therefore, showed an increase of £151,593. As fixed charges rose by no less than £185,139 (following an increase in 1908-9 of £177,600) there was £33,546 less to divide amongst the shareholders, and allowing for a reduction of 2 per cent. in the dividend, the Board is able to increase its carry forward by £43,954.

As to the future, there is every reason to adopt a confident view. The company has so much new mileage running through undeveloped or partially developed territory that its revenues are almost bound to go on growing. A bad season would check the rate of growth, but times would have to be exceedingly bad to arrest it altogether, while, given a series of good harvests the rate of expansions would probably be very rapid. Capital charges are still being increased, the report announcing the issue of another £1,000,000 Bahia Blanca Guaranteed Stock, but it is reasonable to expect that the piling up of capital charges will not go on at anything like the rate seen in the last three years. If this be so the probability is that the B.A. and Pacific has touched bed-rock in the matter of dividends. To date from July 1, the traffic returns show an increase of £155,000, and the gain is much better than it looks, because it includes nothing for company's materials or revenue account. Further, the prospects for the growing crops and the pastoral industry are to date pretty well all that can be desired.

RUBBER.

Malacca—Gula-Kalumpong—The East African Companies.

Very little change in quotations has taken place in the rubber share market during the week, and values have been fairly well maintained, although a slight weakening has to be reported in the price of the crude article. Trade demands continue to show some slight improvement, but the stocks which have accumulated during the last few months are sufficient to act as a drag on prices. It is true, stocks are not more than moderately heavy, but nevertheless it would take a definite increase in consumption to absorb them. The prices at which plantation outputs have been sold during the last eight months places dividend estimates for the current year outside the region of serious uncertainty, and next spring company after company will announce dividend results far higher than those which early in the present year filled the market with so much hope. The development of the motor industry has for some time been the all-important factor in the rubber market. Widely divergent views exist, of course, as to the rate at which motor traction will spread, but there are few who doubt that a large expansion must take place. The commercial car and the taxi-cab have yet to make much headway in our own provincial cities as well as on the Continent and in America; and perhaps those are not far wrong who believe that in our time the world's use of the motor car will be ten times as great as it is now. Mr. Lampard has seriously put forward this view, and there may be others who agree with him. But the figures which arise out of it are stupendous. For if it now takes 35,000 tons of rubber to satisfy the demands of the motor industry, that trade may, according to the optimists, some day require 350,000 tons. A far more moderate view will satisfy the average rubber investor, and Mr. Lampard has probably overstated his case; but the argument is not more exaggerated than the statements which are now being made as to the calamities which are likely to happen from over-production in 1916.

The newspapers now arriving from the East contain editorial criticisms of the report of the Malacca annual meeting. The Straits Times hits hard, and is not satisfied with the reasons given by the chairman for resting so large a number of trees. The blundering of the tappers, it rightly points out, cannot sufficiently account for the largeness of the number of trees which have remained untapped, and if the figures given in the company's reports as to the number and ages of the Malacca trees were correctly stated, the company should have been able to make good its promised output quite apart from the trees which could possibly need resting. The charge is one which I think the Malacca directors should answer; and shareholders have a right to know the details as to the number of trees rested, the number now actually fit for tapping, the condition of the trees on the estate generally, and the prospects of future yields. It was understood that the ages of the trees on the company's Asahan estate were estimated by means of an ingenious system of girth measurement devised by Mr. Burgess, the late manager; and if this is so, the directors should be in possession of full information as to the sizes of its trees, a matter which on such an estate as Malacca is of far greater practical importance than the question of age. There seems to be no reason for doubting the bonâ fides of the directors, but a clear statement from the board on the points mentioned would do much to relieve the anxiety of shareholders as to the actual value of their property. It is satisfactory to note that the Straits Times, which has of late strongly criticised the Malacca directors, now speaks of the property as follows:—

Some months ago, when prices were high, we advised local holders of the shares to sell to London if London would buy, but we do not repeat that advice at present prices. Even with all the defects we have mentioned the estate can be made handsomely profitable if it is well handled. It can never compare acre for acre with really high-grade estates, but the area is so large relatively to the capital that it can win back a good reputation even on very moderate average outputs if it is managed efficiently.

Some correspondents have written to me asking for seven years' purchase valuations of the big producers. The scale which I published recently for valuing the younger companies is so moderate that it seems hardly fair to apply it to the older companies whose outputs are perhaps (as in the case of Anglo-Malay and Linggi) 50 per cent. higher than the moderate estimates which I assumed, and I cannot do better than extract from the table which I published in these columns on June 15 my seven years' purchase valuation of the big producers on the basis of the higher outputs which those companies are actually giving:—

| | s. d. | s. d. |
| Anglo-Malay | 24 6 | 24 3 |
| Bukit Rajah | 15¼ | 16 |
| Cicely | 38 6 | 42 6 |
| Federated Selangor | 15¾ | 15 |
| Golden Hope | 6¾ | 5 |
| Lanadron | 6 | 5⅛ |
| Linggi | 45 9 | 44 3 |
| London Asiatic | 14 3 | 12 6 |
| Pataling | 63 0 | 57 6 |
| Selangor | 58 0 | 61 0 |
| Vallambrosa | 39 0 | 39 9 |

It will be seen that my figures of four months ago bear a remarkable similarity to to-day's quotations. Many of my market friends think that a seven years' purchase basis—meaning, as it does, an average estimated return of about 14 per cent. per annum—is too low to apply to companies of the first rank, and that such shares would not be overvalued at ten years' purchase. All, however, I think will agree that the basis is one upon which in a general way purchases may be made without much risk. A return of 14 per cent. is attractive, but if the shares rise much above the seven years' figures my advice is: Sell and exchange for cheaper shares. There are now many to be had among the younger companies which will give you a larger eventual yield than you will obtain from any of the big producers. Linggi has large liquid resources, and is worth holding for a higher figure, but Cicely should be exchanged for a cheaper share, and I see no particular attraction in Vallambrosa at its present price. Pataling may be expected to reach a higher level.

Gula-Kalumpong is a share which will stand the test of my valuation scale. The figures are as under:—

GULA-KALUMPONG.

| Acres. | Age of Rubber. | Valuation Scale. Per Acre. £ s. d. | Total. £ |
|---|---|---|---|
| 61 | 9 years | 589 5 0 | 35,959 |
| 32 | 7 years | 498 15 0 | 15,960 |
| 46 | 6 years | 445 0 0 | 20,470 |
| 116 | 5 years | 378 15 0 | 44,979 |
| 1,463 | 4 years | 302 10 0 | 442,557 |
| 1,052 | 3 years | 175 0 0 | 184,100 |
| 202 | 2 years | 85 0 0 | 17,170 |
| 312 | Newly-planted | 12 10 0 | 3,900 |
| 36 | Rambong rubber | | 1,080 |
| 1,412 | Cocoanuts | | 30,000 |
| 1,299 | Sugar Cane | | 30,000 |
| 3,481 | Jungle | | 10,443 |
| | Working Capital | | 50,000 |
| | Divide by number of shares, 415,000 | | £886,249 |
| | Value of Share | | £2 2 6 |

Mr. Thomas Boyd, the general manager of Gula-Kalumpong, has an excellent reputation as a planter, and the large acreage of four-year-old and three-year-old rubber promises early and increasing dividends. The Gula estate is held rent free in perpetuity, and Kalumpong is subject to a rent of only 6d. per acre. Sugar is expected to give the company a profit of £6,500 per annum, and the prospectus estimates that the cocoanuts should eventually return a net income of £11,000 per annum.

No feature of the present year is more remarkable than the number of flotations of East African rubber properties. Investors were attracted in particular by the fact that Ceara rubber can be tapped a year earlier than it is customary to tap Hevea. Although the yields are small, ranging from ¼ lb. of rubber per tree upwards, close planting gives a satisfactory yield per acre, and, as it is necessary to tap the trees only from twelve to twenty times per annum, the cost of collection is not necessarily high. After the tree has been cut the latex is allowed to coagulate on the bark of the tree, from which it is afterwards removed in the form of "scrap." Many of these East African properties appear to have been greatly over-valued on flotation, and, as valuers seldom adopt an acreage basis of valuation, it is difficult to form an opinion as to the real value of an estate. Some rough figures which I give below will, however, enable my readers to compare the valuations of the estates in which they may be interested:—

EAST AFRICAN COMPANIES.

| | Expert's valuation per tree. | Purchase price per tree. | Age of oldest trees. | Present Share Quotation. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Anglo-East African (2s.) | 4 11 | 3 6 | 3½ | — |
| Gazi (£1) | 3 9 | 3 9 | 1½ | ⅛ prem. |
| Kamna (£1) | 4 10 | 3 7 | 4 | ⅝ |
| Kibwezi (2s.) | 11 4 | 9 1 | 3 | 1s. |
| Kifulu (2s.) | 4 1 | 2 4 | 3 | 6d. dis. |
| Lewa (£1) | 5 4 | 4 5 | 10-12 | ⅜ dis. |
| Manihot (2s.) | 6 6 | 4 4 | 3 | par |
| Mkumbi (5s.) | 5 2 | 4 1 | 3 | 3s. 6d. |
| Muhesa (£1) | 2 0 | 1 8 | 8 | 1 11/16 |
| Witu (2s.) | 4 11 | 3 2 | 2 | 1s. 9d |

In several cases it will be noticed that promoters and directors in fixing the purchase price have not hesitated to make substantial reductions in their experts' valuations, and there appears to be a distinct tendency among valuers to place too high a figure upon properties of this description. Scarcity of labour seems likely to stand in the way of the realisation of prospectus estimates, and East African planters for the most part do not appear to have either the skill or the knowledge equal to that of the average planter in Malaya. Ceara rubber was tried in Ceylon thirty years ago, and it proved a failure, but some satisfactory results have been obtained in East Africa, and such companies as Lewa and Muhesa seem likely to justify their existence. The latter has just declared an interim dividend of 2s. per share.

I am informed that the statement quoted in these columns last week as to the price originally paid for the Kamna property was afterwards unreservedly withdrawn, and a full apology made to the original vendors. The price mentioned, I must admit, appeared ridiculously inadequate, and the board, it is said, regarded the statement as too wild to be worthy of reply. Regarded strictly as a valuation such as should form the basis of a sale under existing conditions in German East Africa, Mr. Lillingston's report I think places the value of Kamna at too high a figure, but treated simply as a confirmation of Mr. Hogg Robertson's original valuation, and as an opinion as to what return the shareholders may expect from the property within the next five years, it seems fair and reasonable, and subject to the labour difficulty being overcome there seems no reason why Mr. Lillingston's estimates should not be realised.

MINES.

MODERATE BUSINESS—ACTIVITY IN DIAMONDS AND A REVIVAL IN THE "JUNGLE"—EAST RANDS—SCOTTISH MASHONALAND DIVIDEND — THE ESPERANZA SLUMP.

On the whole a moderate amount of business, mainly of a professional character, was transacted in the Mining markets last week, a slackening of interest in one or two sections being more than offset by a revival of activity in other departments. The best features were the development of a buoyant tendency by diamond descriptions, and a fairly general recovery in West African gold shares. On the other hand, South Africans finished the week in a depressed condition, Kaffirs being disturbed by the circulation of adverse rumours regarding the position of the East Rand Proprietary, whose shares had come to be regarded as the nearest approach to an investment that any mining share can possibly attain to.

The East Rand rumours following so soon upon the New Kleinfontein disappointment and the disappointment caused by one or two Eastern Rand propositions which have not got beyond the development stage, had more effect than they probably would have done had general conditions been more favourable. As it was, in a very short space of time the market valuation of the East Rand Proprietary was reduced by over half a million sterling, the shares dropping from 5¼ to 5 sellers, and other leading Kaffirs were offered down. Rhodesian favourites sympathetically drooped. Various rumours were circulated; it was alleged that one of the East Rand's shafts had caved, that recent developments had yielded a lower grade of ore, and that management changes had taken place. The drop in the shares occurred at the close of business on Friday, and it was not until mid-day on Monday that any official information was known of in the market. The official cable states that one of the joint general managers has resigned, but it contains no reference to any adverse change in the mining position. The shares have partially recovered, and the impression now prevails that the fall was due to a "bear" raid.

In connection with the activity which has sprung up in diamond shares, a rumour has been circulated as to the Premier Company having come to an agreement once more with the De Beers and the Diamond Syndicate, and there has also been talk of one or more of the smaller enterprises being absorbed by one of the big producers. Whether or not there is any foundation for these reports we must "wait and see," but there is no doubt about the market for the precious stones being in a better condition, judging by advices received from the chief Continental diamond-dealing centres. In all European countries the demand for diamonds is stated to be active, and "the London syndicate has the greatest trouble in meeting all the requirements," but it is expected at Antwerp that there will be a large November shipment of German stones, and that with the New Year normal production will be again reached in German South-west Africa. Strong support coming on a rather restricted market has caused a sharp rise in share values. In the case of West Africans, a revival in which has been patiently awaited by many, buying by "the shops" started the movement. This demand found dealers short of shares, and their repurchases naturally assisted to advance quotations. A few weeks ago, when Ashanti Goldfields and Gold Coast Amalgamated were depressed, I expressed the opinion that they should be picked up by people in a position to take shares off the market for a time. Amalgamated led the recent recovery, and at 3⅛ already show a moderate profit on the price ruling when I last referred to them. Eventually, if not in the near future, they will probably further recover, and Ashanti Goldfields also I expect sooner or later to improve upon their present price of £2.

The financial policy of the directors of the Scottish Mashonaland is in a striking contrast to that of some other mining concerns I could mention. The company named earned a net profit of £24,681 in the twelve months ended June 30 last, as compared with £15,261 in the preceding financial year, for which period a dividend of 10 per cent. was paid. Although a repetition of this distribution would call for but little more than half the 1909-10 profits, the directors are declaring only 5 per cent., "owing to the general decline in market prices." Upon any general improvement, however, they intend to make a further distribution in the form of an interim dividend for the current financial year. The company's investments, at market prices ruling on the 20th ultimo, together with its cash, represented a total sum of nearly £130,000, as against an issued capital of £126,050. In exchange for its Banket holding, the company will get Rhodesia Exploration shares, and will be entitled to participate in the new issue, which at 2¼ represents a bonus to the subscribers. Besides this interest, the Scottish Mashonaland has investments in foreign railways (debenture stock and preference shares) and shares in Rand, Rhodesian, and other mining companies. At par its own shares appear a fair speculative holding for dividends. In the Rhodesian boom in the early part of the year they rose to 25s.

During the past fortnight some £350,000 has been wiped off the market value of Esperanza, whose Mexican mine is managed by a company incorporated in New Jersey, U.S.A., the bulk of the shares in that concern being held by the English company. Possibly if the intermediate control were eliminated shareholders on this side would get earlier information as to mining operations, and the shares might then become a steadier market. It is pretty evident that the recent slump from about 2¾ to 1¾ was started by selling by some operators who had early knowledge that the September return would make a poor showing, but probably the fall would not have gone so far as it did had it not been that a firm of brokers on this side had 30,000 shares open. The firm in question was "hammered" last week, and the selling out in this connection naturally accentuated the weakness of the market in Esperanzas. The price has since regained part of the ground lost, but the present quotation of £2 is more than a sovereign below the highest of the current year. Uusually the Esperanza returns are announced about the 17th of the following month, but the September figures were not sent out from the London office until the 22nd ultimo. These figures showed a further drop in the profit to £7,176, the lowest monthly total reported since July last year. From January to July of the current year the earnings averaged about £17,000 a month, but in August they dropped to £9,485. The further reduction in September is attributed by the manager to a lack of sulphide ores during the national holidays, the miners refusing to work for a period of about ten days. He adds that during August and September much necessary repair work about the plant added considerably to the expenses, but beginning with the month just ended he anticipates improvement in production. Dividends which fell to 1s. per share per quarter in the latter half of last year have been on the basis of 1s. 6d. per quarter this year. Such distributions call for a sum of £136,500 per annum, so that it is to be hoped that the manager's anticipations will be fulfilled and a quick recovery in earnings be witnessed, or the dividend rate may have to be lowered again.

The Latest Australian Gamble—Mr. Doolette's Bullfinch—The Fall in Ivanhoes—Lake View Position.

Although the recent improvement in the metals of the Broken Hill mines produce has been maintained, business in the shares of this group has slackened, and prices, together with those of some other Australian mines, have sagged. The explanation is to be found in the fact that Colonial speculators have turned their attention to "fresh fields and pastures new." Recent developments at a mine called the Bullfinch, situated twenty miles from Southern Cross on the Yilgarn goldfield, Western Australia, have given such satisfactory results that ground in the locality has been snapped up. Private cables report that the new field is monopolising attention on all the Australian stock exchanges. Companies are being rapidly floated, and already share values have risen to substantial premiums. So far, however, none of the new ventures has made its appearance on the London market, but unless the enthusiasm in the Colony soon abates it is probable that British speculators will be invited to take a hand in the gamble. Mr. G. P. Doolette, the well-known chairman of the Great Boulder Proprietary, is the chief proprietor of the Bullfinch mine, on which ore valued at nearly a quarter of a million sterling is stated to have already been opened up. The width of the principal reef runs up to 24 ft., and a shipment of 60 tons of ore yielded nearly 7 ozs. per ton. Speaking in the Westralian Parliament the other day, the Prime Minister is reported to have made the following glowing reference to this mine:—"Even Kalgoorlie and the Golden Rule sink into insignificance when one listens to reports regarding this property, which bids fair to eclipse anything discovered in the history of the State." Such figures as I have quoted justify a certain amount of enthusiasm, but one swallow does not make a summer, and good developments on one mine may not be repeated on other properties in the same neighbourhood. So that in the event of shares being introduced on the market here speculators must exercise discrimination, and not take too much for granted. In the Westralian boom about a dozen years ago there was a rush after shares of companies which had "Hannans" or "Lake View" as part of their title, but the great majority of those concerns proved unsuccessful.

In the rush after shares in properties in the neighbourhood of the Bullfinch, colonial speculators have been disposing of some of their other mining interests, and possibly this explains why Ivanhoes have come down in price to 7⅜ ex the last quarterly dividend. When they were up to £9 in the early part of this year I suggested that they were not cheap and was prepared for a set-back, but I hardly expected them to come down to the present price. For some time the company's monthly profits have been a little in excess of £21,000, after allowing for outlay on plant as well as development. It requires a sum of £240,000 to maintain dividends at 24s. per annum, the rate paid for several years past. A new hoist having been erected at the mine, it is stated that the output will be increased by about a thousand tons per month. This should go some way towards counterbalancing, if it does not fully offset, a possible further decline in grade. Although the recent drop in the price of the shares has discounted a reduction in the dividend rate, it is by no means a certainty that the company will have to reduce its distributions in the near future, and I do not think that holders need be in a hurry to sell.

The Lake View Consols—the company which owned the famous mine of that name—is now principally, if not entirely, a finance undertaking. The mine is still being worked, but by a separate company, the Lake View and Star, in which the Lake View Consols has a substantial share interest. The annual report of the last-named, issued last week, shows that the company has dipped rather heavily into oil, its largest holdings in this connection being in two of the Maikop ventures, and shareholders will doubtless be particularly interested to hear what the chairman has to say regarding oil at to-day's meeting. The schedule of assets also shows that the Lake View Consols has increased its holding in the Broken Hill South Blocks (which I understand will declare its initial dividend before the end of the year), and has acquired a substantial interest in the Amalgamated Zinc and Great Fitzroy. The profit for the past financial year, which ended June 30, was £25,930, as compared with £33,075 for 1908-9, but the balance brought in was larger than before by £8,000, so that the total sum available was practically the same at £38,000. After payment of the usual dividend of 1s. per share, which requires £17,480, and allowing for dividend duty and transfer to reserve, there will remain £16,188 to be carried forward.

INDUSTRIALS.

Oil Shares Dull—Egyptians in Better Demand—The Aerated Bread Agitation—Otis Steel Results.

The Industrial Market has developed no outstanding feature. Oil shares have continued dull for the most part, though Egyptian descriptions met with a little demand. The confident statements as to production made in a circular issued by the Kern River Board have so far, at any rate, failed to rally the shares. Egyptian land and finance shares have been more freely inquired for, and the market is expecting larger support from Cairo and Alexandria a little later on, when the fellaheen is no longer preoccupied with the movement of a record cotton crop. The poor results achieved by the Aerated Bread Company have again stimulated to action Messrs. C. Pownall and P. D. Penn, who invite shareholders to send proxies for use at the meeting on Friday. These proxies are to be used for one purpose—namely, to prevent the present managing director, when he resigns that post, from continuing to remain chairman of the board or a director. This is a plain issue upon which shareholders can give expression to their view. Surprisingly good results are shown by the Otis Steel Company during the year just ended, the trading profit having risen from £56,700 to £150,200. The dividend on the Consolidated stock is raised from 5 per cent.—the rate paid for four years—to 6 per cent., and after allowing for this step the bulk of the increased profit is available for the strengthening of the company's financial position. A sum of £39,000, representing profits earned but not realised during the financial year, is transferred to suspense account against £18,000 brought in from the same source on account of the previous year, and £25,000 is again placed to reserve. The service of the 5 per cent. debentures takes £19,800, or an amount equivalent to the dividend, as compared with £16,500, and £20,000 is set aside to form the nucleus of a dividend equalisation fund. Since the accounts were made up debentures to the value of £12,700 have been redeemed, reducing the total outstanding at the present time to £267,400. This leaves the service fund available for debenture redemption or purchase at £17,800, and a contract has been entered into for the purchase of a further £5,700. The new large plate mill has continued to run well, and a satisfactory increase in business has resulted from its erection. The Western Telegraph Company has evidently enjoyed a good year. After paying its usual dividend and bonus of 7 per cent. the company is transferring £135,000 to reserve fund and £10,000 to the land and buildings depreciation fund. A year ago the appropriations were £30,000 less.

THE INVESTMENT REGISTRY AND "TRUTH."

A report of the recent annual meeting of the Investment Registry, Limited, has been sent out with a circular from the secretary, who states that "an official reply to the attacks which a certain small section of the press has levelled against our company during the past two years will be found in the speeches made by Sir John Rolleston, M.P., our chairman, and Lord Elcho, one of our directors." Neither of these gentlemen condescended to name any particular paper, but probably I shall not be wrong if I assume that their remarks were intended chiefly for my benefit. Yet if that be so their tone is a little bewildering. I was under the impression that the Registry felt grateful for my criticisms—at any rate it professed to be in June last. "Nothing in the world," inquiring correspondents were then assured, "would make us stop the articles in Truth, as they are highly useful to us," and "our thanks are due to Truth for having given us an opportunity of writing this letter to you." From this I might almost have expected a vote of thanks at the annual meeting, but instead of moving one the chairman talked about "venomous detraction," and Lord Elcho said his language was not extravagant. The chairman protested against the Registry being described as a bucket-shop. For my part I have never so described it. Bucket-shop is a term of elastic meaning, but it could not justly be applied to a concern which, whatever else may be said about its business, does not engage in gambling transactions with its customers. When the word has been mentioned in my articles it has been in allusion to establishments with which Mr. Henry Lowenfeld was associated before he became "the rescuer and deliverer"—so Sir John Rolleston styles him—of the Investment Registry, the scorner of speculation, the preacher of pure investment according to the Science of Geographical Distribution of Capital.

I have no animus against the Investment Registry, but when people ask me, as they constantly do, whether I recommend them to act upon the advice of that institution, I feel bound to point out that its advice cannot be regarded as disinterested. It is not a philanthropic institution, though some of its circulars importuning investors to submit lists of their holdings for criticism and advice almost suggest that it is. With an issued capital of £111,367, the Registry for the past year made a profit of £50,686, so that it is doing very well for itself. Needless to say, ordinary broker's commissions and charges would not produce such a profit as that after bearing the heavy expenditure the company incurs on its much-vaunted organisation and what are described as the efforts of its publishing department "in spreading financial knowledge." It is in quite a different way that this profit is mainly made. As a more correct description of the Registry than some that have been given, the chairman suggested "merchant of investments," and that really is a very good definition of its business. It acquires lines of bonds or stock which it sells at a profit, and my criticisms of its methods are chiefly based upon its non-disclosure of its position in these transactions. A man sends to the Registry a list of the securities he holds. In reply he may get a letter urging him to sell either a portion of them or perhaps the whole lot and to put the proceeds into investments recommended by the Registry. It is pretty certain that these recommendations will include what are, I believe, known in the establishment as "shop" goods—that is to say, securities which the Registry has bought wholesale and is retailing at a profit. But in many cases at least the customer does not understand this, nor is he aware that he is being pressed to buy more or less obscure securities which are possibly without any quotation on the London Stock Exchange and without any market outside the office in Waterloo Place. In speaking at the meeting of the work of the various branches of the Registry, the chairman used this curious simile:—

> If the Purchase Department is the producer and provides the food, other departments have to see to it that the body of the consumer is in order, and that his stomach is able to receive, assimilate, and digest the food provided for him.

So long as the consumer understands that he is being fed up with the Registry's own special viands he has no right to complain even if—as may happen—he suffers later on from indigestion. He has occasion for complaint, however, if he is allowed to swallow these things in the belief that they form part of the ordinary fare of the stock markets. Judging from the inquiries that I receive, a great many people fail to perceive that the Registry is a "merchant of investments," largely engaged in disposing of its own merchandise. They are apt to look upon it as an institution which very obligingly counsels investors not as a seller of goods but in the impartial character of a broker or agent, and I therefore regard it as a duty to open their eyes to the true state of the case.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Yankee Share-Pushing.

In reply to my recent paragraph Mr. Hugh Higginson, "special representative" in Ireland of the International Asbestos Mills and Power Company (incorporated under the laws of the State of Wyoming) has sent me a voluminous letter. I devoted a score or so of lines to a mild criticism of a circular in which he recommended this concern as "one of the very finest and safest investments in the world," and predicted dividends equal to 750 per cent. on the present price of 15 cents. for each one dollar share. His letter would occupy several columns of Truth, and in addition he has favoured me with two bulky packages of correspondence, circulars, and advertisements from American newspapers, to say nothing of samples of asbestos. I am sorry to disappoint Mr. Higginson, but I have neither the time nor the space to deal with this matter in detail. On this side of the Atlantic, at any rate, the shares he is offering are not worth serious consideration as an investment. Mr. Higginson tells me that he is an Irishman who has not even kissed the blarney stone. I should think, though, that it has been saluted by the Yankees who are employing him in this share-pushing scheme. The correspondence he forwards shows, inter alia, that in recognition of his energy and success in selling the shares they appointed him a member of its "advisory board," and proceeded to print his name on "the new literature of the company" without waiting for his acceptance of this responsible post! His letter leads me to regard Mr. Higginson as a very ingenuous and impressionable person. I do not doubt that he believes all he says about the company, but he must pardon me if I am sceptical. I have had a long experience of the ways of Yankee share pushers, and I have never once yet come across a case of this description in which the purchasers over here have not had occasion to regret their bargain.

The Charing Cross Bank Failure.

Inquiries are now reaching me from a number of depositors in the Charing Cross Bank, who wish to know what steps they should take. There is unfortunately nothing to do but to wait the course of the liquidation. Claims should, however, be sent to the Official Receiver, Carey Street, W.C., and depositors who are unable to be present at the meeting called for November 21 should give proxies to that official, who can be relied upon to use them in the best interests of the creditors. The question of the proposed relief fund is dealt with in another column under the heading of "Entre Nous."

A Skating Rink Balance Sheet.

One of the shareholders of the South London Skating Rink, Limited, sends me the prospectus which induced him to put money into this undertaking. It set out imposingly an estimate of a net profit of £16,500 per annum. He also sends the recently issued first annual balance sheet. It shows a loss for the year of £1,059 15s. 8d. The directors are Messrs. Edmund Smith, Carlton Roberts, and J. W. Palmer; and the result the company has achieved is just what might have been anticipated.

"An Invitation from a Bucket-Shop."

At the end of June I referred under the above heading to a letter which I had received from Lennox and Co., 67, Leadenhall Street, E.C., in answer to my warnings against their "Combine Stock Deals." They asked me to inspect their ledger and communicate with some of their clients respecting the profits they had made. At that time the business had been carried on for about two months. Professing to make an average profit of about 12s. a fortnight on every £2 entrusted to them, Lennox and Co. nobly "guaranteed all the capital invested against loss," and conducted the so-called "deals" free of any commission or other charges. Such a business as that is an unmistakable flat-trap, and in reiterating that view of it, and declining the firm's invitation, I remarked that no number of testimonials from "clients" would modify my opinion. Unfortunately, however, many simple souls imagine that a few preliminary payments of pretended profits are sufficient proof of the genuineness and soundness of a bucket-shop scheme of this kind, and the result is that they not only proceed to "invest" more heavily themselves, but unconsciously play the part of decoy ducks to other people. In the case of Lennox and Co. events took the usual course, and a few days ago a judgment was obtained against them—no defence being offered—at the instance of a lady named Billing, who had been victimised to the amount of no less than £132 7s. 6d.

The Hessell-Gould Trusts.

Just about the time when McKinley, Alexander and Sons were beginning to disappoint the subscribers to their Three Months Trusts, some bucket-shop harpies calling themselves Hessell, Gould and Co., 66, Victoria Street, S.W., launched a precisely similar scheme—so similar indeed that the very words of the McKinley circulars were copied. In pointing this out on July 13 I suggested that the end, as well as the beginning of the story would be the same. A lady subscriber to a Trust which expired on October 5 now sends me some interesting correspondence which she has had with Hessell, Gould and Co. Her subscription was £2, and on October 5 they informed her that, including the return of this amount, she was entitled to a sum of £7 13s., that they awaited her instructions, and that further orders would receive prompt attention. She asked for her money, and in reply she was then told that her name was "on our pay sheet," for October 14, "when cheque will be forwarded." As no cheque arrived on the 15th she wired for it. The answer was a letter (or rather circular, for it had evidently been duplicated) coolly stating that the firm were holding over the cheque and telling a cock-and-bull story of some operation in Unions, for which they required "the individual support of clients acting in substantial sums." The lady wrote that they could keep £2 out of the amount due to her, but that she wanted the balance. That request was ignored, and when she again demanded the cheque Hessell, Gould and Co. retorted that her name was on their pay sheet for October 28. I do not know whether it is there still, but anyhow the firm's failure to pay on the first date, and their subsequent shuffling in the matter is a sufficient indication of the character of the bucket-shop they keep and the folly of the people who patronise it.

T. Morton Harris and Co.

Just a month ago I noted the appearance of a new bucket-shop firm calling themselves T. Morton Harris and Co., of Victoria Buildings, Temple Row, Birmingham. Last week these gentry made another wholesale distribution of their flat-catching circulars, and as the result I have been bombarded with copies from all parts of the country. One of the gentlemen invited to patronise the "new method of monthly profit-sharing deals" is a member of the London Stock Exchange, who expresses the hope that I shall warn the public against Harris and Co. before any great harm is done. Well, I have already done my best, but a large section of the public is incurably stupid and credulous, and I doubt not that many will fall into this trap. Possibly some will even be deluded by the manifestly mendacious twaddle of an article headed, "An Interview with the Firm of T. Morton Harris and Co.," which is enclosed with the circulars. It purports to be "reprinted from the Northern Standard of September 15, 1910." So far as I can discover from the Press directories the only Northern Standard is a paper published in Monaghan, and if this article was ever published in its columns at all it is pretty certain that it was merely an advertisement.

Delyannis Again.

There are no bounds to the impudence of the man Delyannis, otherwise "de Lyann," of Cosmopolitan Financier and Atlas Banking Corporation notoriety. The latest move of this Greek adventurer is an appeal for subscriptions to a concern styled the Anglo-European Press (Parent) Syndicate, Limited, which, it appears, has been formed to acquire "that unique financial organ," the Cosmopolitan Financier, from the parties who have been running it since the bankruptcy of Cosmopolitan Publications, Limited. It might be supposed that by this time everybody would be on their guard against Delyannis. He evidently believes, however, that he has not yet exhausted his supply of dupes, and there are so many credulous noodles about that perhaps he is right.

NEW ISSUE.

Mrs. Bull, Limited, is a company formed with a capital of £150,000 to acquire and carry on the newly established weekly journal, Mrs. Bull, under the same direction as that of John Bull. The capital is divided into 100,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and 400,000 readers' preference shares of 2s. 6d. each. The latter, which are now offered for subscription, are entitled to a fixed cumulative preference dividend of six per cent. per annum, rank in priority to the ordinary shares both as to capital and dividend, and may be converted at any time into ordinary shares.

"QUEER STORIES" from TRUTH. Now ready, Series XVI. Price 1s., at all booksellers, and from the Publisher, 10, Bolt Court, Fleet Street. "They are one of the wonders of the world, these stories, and people are never tired of asking who writes them."—Bystander.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of TRUTH.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Beecham.—A sound holding, and not over-valued having regard to immediate prospects.

Grain.—I should select Central Argentine Deferred.

Pyrmont.—1. I do not look for an increase in the early future, but the present rate appears to be fairly well secured. 2. All common shares of American roads are liable to big ups and downs, but I know of no "hidden pitfalls" about the share you name. 3. None whatever. If you mean to buy for investment, you would get the shares registered into your own name, and the dividends would then be mailed to you.

Quiz.—The company has valuable assets, and, taking the long view, its shares are probably not over-valued. But they will doubtless fluctuate a good deal in sympathy with general conditions in the country.

Sussex.—The shares are not unlikely to go higher, but there is certainly an element of speculation about a purchase now.

Tramore.—You probably have a profit worth securing; the future course of the shares is open to a good deal of doubt.

Mines.

Bornu.—I have not heard of any dealings in the shares referred to, and do not recommend the suggested exchange. I understand that one of the directors you mention has resigned.

Crop.—I see no reason to expect much early advance in the shares named. Cruiser.—I have seen no recent information as to the company's operations, and am unable to express an opinion as to the value of the shares

Dutch.—See note in TRUTH of September 7 last. Your money could be much more hopefully employed than in the shares named. Doubtful.—Have nothing to do with this Yankee share pushing scheme, as to which I may have something to say in an early issue.

Mundle.—I think you will be able to realise them all to better advantage sooner or later.

Sream.—I consider the shares a hopeful speculative lock-up.

Vanduara.—1 The company is treating zinc tailings purchased from mines on the Broken Hill field. 2. A speculative holding.

Wotton.—1. I am not greatly attracted by them. 2 and 3. Very speculative selections.

Mixed Securities.

A Welsher.—Indian Threes, New South Wales Threes, and Great Western Railway 2½ per cent. debenture stock. 2. Hold for a better market. Ailesund.—1. I will make inquiries. 2. I would not buy more of these. 3. They are highly speculative, but might be held in hopes of some improvement within the next few months

Bankie.—1. They may go a point or two lower, but having held so long I should hardly recommend a sale now. 2. If you selected any of the leading old-established joint stock banks, such, for instance, as the London County and Westminster, London Joint Stock, or Lloyds, you could hardly go wrong. Bunk.—1. In view of the present disturbed state of the market, better delay averaging. 2. They may not have much early advance, but are a hopeful lock-up.

Cosmos.—1. You would be notified by the bank when presenting the coupon that fell due after the bond was drawn. But you could follow the drawings yourself from the Bondholders' Register, published fortnightly at 6d., from 2, Nicholas Passage, Nicholas Lane, E.C. 2. Yes, a dividend of 3d. per share will be paid at the end of this month. 3. £695, after deducting development outlay. Clodhopper.—You might hold 1 and 2, though whether dividends will be resumed yet awhile is doubtful. As regards 3 a settlement will be come to eventually, but whether the bonds will go much higher is open to question. A scheme is at the present time under consideration, but the terms are not good, and the proposal will most likely be rejected. C. W. P.—No. 1 is a sound industrial, and No. 3 looks well secured. I do not care for 2. Reserves small, goodwill heavy. China Aster.—1. Presumably if the company has to reconstruct owing to an insufficient number of the preference shares being subscribed, the applications for such shares will be cancelled. I would not subscribe any more money in connection with this concern. 2. No; nothing can be done. As to the other matter, the paper you mention is but one among scores which are ready to hire out their columns to any bucket shop sharp who will pay their price. In three-fourths of the swindles that are committed the Press takes a big share of the "swag" for advertisements.

DICKEVE.—1. A small dividend should be paid for the current year, but the immediate prospects are not good enough to suggest any early sustained advance in the stock, which will probably continue to fluctuate rather erratically. 2. These might be realised. 3. The bonds are of a speculative character, and I should be inclined to accept the present figure.

HOPEFUL.—Nos. 1 and 2 are very fair investments and worth holding. No 3 is very speculative, and in the event of a moderate recovery it might be as well to sell. 4. I regret the mistake, which arose from the fact of there being a rubber company with a similar title. I am not greatly attracted by the shares you refer to. HARZ.—1. The concern is not known on the London market. You might try the local press. 2. I have a poor opinion of the shares, but you are, of course, legally liable for the call.

J. H.—In 1923 at par, but purely at the option of the Government. If there were any chance of redemption at that date the stock would not stand where it does. You could not have a better investment list. I would not like to say the stock has yet touched bottom. JANE.—1. An excellent investment, but the uncalled liability makes it unsuitable for many people. In your case I would suggest instead the 4 per cent. debenture stock of the Buenos Ayres Great Southern Railway. 2. It is impossible for me to say.

MEIKLE.—1. They should have a moderate recovery sooner or later, but I should be inclined to put the additional money into something else, so as to spread the risk. 2. They seem a fair speculation at present price. 3. The shares look pretty well high enough. MEDDLER.—1. Anglo-South American and National of Australasia. 2. Hold for some further recovery. MINTESQUE.—1 and 2. I have no recent information as to either concern, and would suggest your writing to the secretaries. 3. The address is 49, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

PHILOSOPHER.—1. The coupon has been paid since January. The prior liens rank ahead of the 5 per cent. bonds, but both issues are dependent for interest upon the Ecuador Government. 2. A purchase at the present price would be very much of a gamble. 3. I believe developments have latterly been less satisfactory.

RANDOLPH.—Nos. 1 and 2 are fair speculative holdings. You might accept the present price for 3. R. P. J.—No. 2 and the bonds of No. 3 would be fair semi-speculative selections. I do not recommend 1, and would suggest instead Metropolitan Electric Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock. ROMA.—New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds, Cunard Steamship 4½ per cent. debenture stock, and Russian 4½ per cent. bonds.

SNAP.—Kansas City Terminals 4 per cent. bonds. You could hardly have anything better secured. SOMERSET.—I look for a higher price in the early future.

T. J. P.—Kansas City Terminals 4 per cent. bonds, Grand Trunk Pacific A bonds, London, Chatham and Dover Railway 3½ per cent. debenture stock, and City of Copenhagen Fours.

VICARIOUS.—1. It appears to be doing fairly well, but, like No. 2, which also came out with good prospects, the shares are highly speculative. 3. A well-secured bond. Hold. I would not buy 4. No. 5 is over-capitalised, and I see no reason to expect any material improvement. No. 6 is not particularly attractive.

WAR.—1. I should prefer one of the old-established joint stock banks. 2. An absolute gamble.

RUBBER.

AALESUND.—1. The Trusts are sound enough, but they have made very little money lately, and their dividends for the current year will, I am afraid, prove disappointing. You would probably do better by buying cheap shares. 2. Yes. 3. Tea is doing very well. Hold your shares. British India paid 10 per cent. for 1909. Next dividend after close of year. 4. Keep P.P.K. Bukit Mertajam and Merlimau. Take advantage of any substantial rise to realise your profits on the heavy shares. A. B.—All sound and reasonably valued on an investment basis at present prices. Should gradually improve in value as the estates grow older. AXE.—Nos. 1 and 2 are sound holdings. No. 3 is more speculative, but worth averaging at present price. No. 4 has some good investments, and at your price should turn out well. But see first reply to "Aalesund." ASHOT. Hold your shares. ALPHA BETA. There are no reasons beyond those mentioned in your letter. It is, of course, speculative, but you might do as you suggest. Labour costs 6d. per day, and cost of production is estimated at 1s 1d. per lb. Shipments should soon show a substantial increase.

BOANERGES.—Your figures are not far wrong, but Anglo-Malay is an exceptionally heavy yielder, outputs being 50 per cent. in excess of standard estimates. A sound holding for substantial dividends, but your figures will show you why, for capital appreciation, I prefer the cheaper shares. BULGER.—Hold them all for the present. No. 1 is the most promising, and No. 2 is sound enough. No. 3 was criticised in these columns on flotation, but I should not sell at present discount. BEECHAM.—Anglo-Java is in good hands. Issued capital, £400,000. Over 9,000 acres under tea, coffee, and rubber mostly young, and no dividend can be expected for three years. But as a lock-up it may be worth present price. BLINKER.—Buy Tremelbye instead, if you can get them under 6. BRAZIL.—My note on the East African companies may perhaps help you. If daily tapping throughout the year were necessary to secure ¼ lb. per tree, your argument would hold good. BITS.—For your purpose you might add 50 per cent. to cost price. BROKER.—Soil and planting not first-class, but purchase price was low. Worth holding for a profit.

CARDINELIS.—1. Take no notice of the circular from the London and Provincial Trust, which is one of the aliases of individuals against whom my readers have often been warned. This particular circular was dealt with in TRUTH on October 19. 2. Your list is a very good one. 3. I have a high opinion of Sungei Salak and United Serdang. 4. Do not invest too large a proportion of your capital in rubber. Gula-Kalumpong and Malacca 6 per cent. debentures should suit you. COLEHERNE.—Semenyih is a sound little company, but there is no market in the shares. CLARE.—1. As a whole your estimates may be regarded as reasonable. 2. In view of the altered outlook I cannot say, but all are worth holding for six months. 3. I entirely agree with you. COLLEGE.—Chersonese is worth holding. For present purchase I prefer Taiping. COEHORN.—Table of July 6 holds good. My private reports from the East on Asiatics are very satisfactory. Should earn 10 per cent. on your price in 1912. CREW.—1. Safe enough, but I think a purchase of Tremelbye or Gula-Kalumpong likely to turn out better. 2. Now quoted at the same price. Well worth buying for future dividends. 3. Look for recovery. CROMDALE.—1. See first reply to "Aalesund." 2. Good dividend payer, but Taiping would probably suit you better. CROWHURST.—1. Nothing wrong, but they cannot advance much until promotion business becomes active. 2. Exchange for Taiping.

D. D.—All calculations as to 1916 are necessarily conjectural. Production costs are now as low as 9d. per lb., and may go lower. Rubber selling in 1916 at 1s. 6d. per lb. gross, with a profit of 9d. per lb., would not exclude 100 per cent. dividends. See my table of July 20. D. WATKINS.—See Rubber Notes. Buy Taiping instead. DOTTIE.—1, 2, and 3. You do not quote purchase price. In view of uncertain outlook, they are now reasonably valued. Sell on any substantial advance this autumn. 4. Yes. The cheaper shares should gradually increase in value. DANDY DICK.—1. See Rule 2. 2 and 3. Not over-valued at present price, but when they show you a fair profit exchange for cheaper shares.

EROMLIG.—1. I do not like the district. 2. Taiping. Buy through your banker or broker.

FURLONGS.—Average a. Instead of increasing your holding of the others buy Taiping.

GWALIA.—1. Worth holding as a speculation. The company has some good business in hand, but markets are, of course, unfavourable. 2. Is in good hands, but is developing slowly. An exchange for Taiping would probably give quicker results. GRUM.—1. Worth holding for improvement. Instead of averaging, buy Taiping. 2. See reply to "College." GOTHAMITE.—Good purchases, but for capital appreciation you might substitute Tremelbye for No. 1. Dennistown is now tapping. Merlimau should earn a dividend in 1912. GURKHA.—1. A good lock-up at par, but I do not look for much appreciation for a year or two. Directors do not anticipate that a call will be made before the end of next year. 2. Taiping. 3. I think so. Prefer a and d. G. and C.—See TRUTH June 15, page 1571, for table of seven years' dividend estimates (Linggi 45s. 9d., Vallambrosa 39s.), and you will see that present quotations approximate very closely to my estimates of value. Hold for recovery and exchange later for cheaper shares. GREEN WAYS.—1. You might do so as a speculation, but the market is limited. Taiping would be safer. 2. Has good speculative possibilities, but conditions have changed. Date of meeting not yet fixed. GUTHRIC.—Hold for recovery, but on any substantial advance sell Nos. 1 and 3, and exchange for cheaper shares, with a view to capital appreciation. GAJAH.—1, 3, and 4. Quite sound. Worth holding. 2. A good dividend payer, but on any substantial advance I should exchange for a cheaper share. 5 and 6. Local companies upon which I cannot advise.

HOPEFUL (Edinburgh).—All good for capital appreciation. Sungei Bahru prospectus estimates:—1910, 10,000 lbs.; 1911, 40,000 lbs.; Lendu, 1912, 8,000 lbs.; 1913, 25,000 lbs. HOPEFUL (Liverpool).—A very speculative lot, and all have been unfavourably noticed in these columns. Watch for an opportunity to sell, and then exchange for Malayan shares. HILLSIDE.—Bikam, 16s.; Padang Jawa, 12s.; Taiping, 11s. There is a freer market in the last-named, and I should prefer it. Bandar Sumatra is a sound purchase.

JINKEE.—The Ledbury and Tremelbye acreage figures were taken from the companies' annual reports. The Financier Rubber Share Handbook should help you. JULIE.—1. Yes. Quite correct. 2. See reply to "Jinkee." 3. Hold Merlimau.

LAKLAM.—Average Malacca and Kinta Kellas. Buy Taiping. On any substantial advance in Nos. 1 and 2 exchange for cheaper shares. LOKU BANDA.—1 and 2. Very sound. 3. A good Travancore company. The district is worth attention. LOUISA.—Exchange for a cheaper share. Taiping.

MAMMON.—1. Allowance was made in table for debentures and options. Your calculations should not be made on total acreage, but on acreage actually planted or, at most, on planting programme. Batu Tiga now has 1,545 acres planted. Treat capital as £70,000, and price to give 10 per cent., with a yield of 500 lbs. per acre at 2s. profit is 11. See table of July 6. 2. For 1s. per lb. profit at 500 lbs. per acre multiply planted acreage by 250 and divide by capital. But considerations of management, locality, and condition of estate, and immediate dividend prospects, of course, modify these theoretical calculations. MICK.—All speculative. Nos. 1 and 2 are worth holding. Sell No. 3 on any recovery. MICKY.—A good list. Nos. 1 and 2 are promising, and No. 3 is a sound lock-up. MAX.—1. Worth averaging as a speculation. 2. I have a good opinion of Ceylon.

Timber and Rubber. 3. Taiping is a good purchase for steady improvement. 4. Of the three I should choose Crudes. M. J. C. —1 and 2. Hold for recovery. 3. About fairly valued at present price. 4. Exchange for Taiping. Meole.—1. A good lock-up. At a discount you might increase your holding. 2. Not recommended. 3. Bucket-shop keepers and similar circularisers almost invariably refuse to accept delivery of unstamped letters, so it is simply wasting the time and labour of postal officials to return such communications in that way. Macsiccar.—A speculative group, of course. 1. Yes. But I do not look for much development this year. 2. See first reply to "Crowhurst." 3. Yes.

Nestor.—1. The shares, which stand at 2,000 per cent. premium, will pay handsome dividends, but they cannot be expected to double in value. The non-dividend payers should however, steadily increase in value as the dividend stage approaches. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 stand in the first class. The others are good for capital appreciation. 2. Your list is a very good one, and should pay you 10 per cent. by the time you mention. I agree with your suggestion as to exchanging Vallambrosa. Nilam.—1. The property is in good hands, but is developing slowly, and other shares are now relatively cheaper. An exchange for Taiping would probably give quicker results. 2. Speculative. Worth holding at present price. 3. Depends upon market activity for its profits. Watch for an opportunity to sell. Nibbler.—1. Chersonese output should increase rapidly next year. Worth holding. 2. Sell at first favourable opportunity. 3. Good speculative holding. Nilambur.—No. 2 is worth averaging. As to No. 3, see first reply to "Nilam." The others are, of course, speculative, but I should not sell at present prices. Novice.—All sound, and should prove good investments.

Ousel.—The chairman announced at Crude statutory meeting that profit for first three months amounted to £15,000.

Palmerston.—Good speculative share. I should not sell at present price, but later you might exchange for a safer holding, such as Taiping. P. E. N.—Tremelbye, Ledbury, Shelford. Pat.—Allagar and Ceylon Cocoa may earn a small dividend this year. Both good. Pete.—Nos. 1 and 3 are good speculative holdings. As to No. 2, see first reply to "Nilam." Hold No. 5 for recovery. On any substantial advance exchange Nos. 4 and 6 for cheaper shares. Puzzled (Hamburg).—Nos. 1, 5, and 8 should gradually recover to your figure. Nos. 2 and 3 are more speculative, but well worth holding at present prices. As to No. 4, see first reply to "Nilam." Poor Dick.—a. I do not. b. Yes. The estate is being developed on lines which should ensure a good future. c. They should eventually recover to your figure.

Quiz.—I do not expect trouble from the Dutch Government. The company has great possibilities. It will take some little time to organise so large a property, but the shares may be regarded as a good lock-up. Quince.—You place so much stress upon your need of something quite safe, though it is to be "low now with every prospect of increasing in value," that I do not care to advise you. Rubber shares are not to be regarded as gilt-edged investments.

Remlap.—An excellent list. All good for capital appreciation. Rhubarb.—Vine Prefs. have a first charge on the assets, and I should not sell at less than the price you mention. If options are not exercised shareholders will decide as to company's future.

Suspicious.—It is a concern of a most speculative character, and I have very little faith in the prospectus estimates. Selina. —Speculative, but worth holding. The company has, I understand, made a good profit. Sagitta.—Is making a good business, and should earn good dividends. Hold for recovery. Stuttgart.—1. Sound. 2. I think so. 3 and 4. Developments to be expected next year should result in a dividend. Sambo.— All speculative. As to No. 1, see reply to "Rhubarb." You must watch the markets and sell the others on the first sign of activity.

Tramore.—See third reply to "Stuttgart." Hold for recovery. No immediate call. Trumpeter.—Both speculative, but well worth holding at present prices. I shall deal with the Crude position after the demonstration to shareholders. Talbot.—A dangerous set; frequently exposed in Truth. Disregard the circulars. Rubber and Oil Consolidated was promoted by the Anglo-Foreign Investments Agency. Watch for an opportunity to sell this and Pacaya. Toto.—Substitute Tremelbye for No. 1 and your list will do very well. Tay.—1 and 2. Both good for present purchase. 3. See third reply to "Stuttgart."

Whitehall.—Kinta Kellas is now producing, and I look for an early dividend. Wag.—All poor. Hardly worth selling, perhaps, at present discounts, but instead of averaging buy Taiping.

York.—1. You hold too large a proportion of the more speculative issues, but they should all see your prices again. 2. Hold by all means. 3. Market conditions. Yendahcea.—Bukit Mertajam Options are a good speculative purchase at 1s. 9d. Options must be exercised before December 31, 1913, but the company may (on giving six months' notice) require holders to exercise one-third of the option at any time after December 31 next. Voices.—1. Not unless rubber goes higher. 2. Unofficial, 1,100,000 lbs. 3. With rubber at 4s. per lb. profit Linggi should earn in 1911 a profit of 300 per cent.

Zena.—See Rubber Notes. The shares should gradually appreciate. Zanskar.—1 Quotations vary during the day, and closing prices are not necessarily a good guide. 2. Dividends since paid:—Anglo-Malay, 6d.; Federated Selangor, 6s.; Golden Hope, 4s.; and Kuala Lumpur, 9s. per share. 3. Hold 2, 3, and 6. When others show a profit exchange for cheaper shares.

Miscellaneous.

A. B. K.—You will find the matter dealt with in an article this week. I have been unable to trace No. 1. The other two are fair holdings. Alderbron.—1. Its chances of being successful on a commercial scale have still to be proved. The shares are at present a gamble. You might sell 3, but I do not advise buying 2 with the proceeds. The company appears to be over capitalised. Alcesti.—1. Organised attempts are being made to effect a settlement, and you might as well hold and await the outcome of these efforts. Nos. 2 and 3 are very fair investments, and worth keeping. 4. I deal with the company's position in an article this week. For the present the stock looks quite high enough, but as a lock-up it is promising. 5. Judging from the brief records I have by me it would appear to be a prosperous concern, but the position is complicated by the fact that the lease expires in 1916. Anna.—Nothing has been published about the concern so far as I am aware since the prospectus. Arbor.—There is good scope for such a company, and its shares should make a good speculative investment. Anxious. —1. The programme sounds well enough, but everything depends upon the way in which it is carried out. For the present, at any rate, I cannot take the responsibility for recommending it. 2. There is, so far as I know, no connection between the two establishments. Ajax.—Write to the secretary. I am under the impression that the person mentioned as chairman resigned a long time ago. Almost Tempted.—Thanks, but I have constantly warned my readers against the Duncan, Forbes, and Co. bucket-shop.

Blick.—1-3. I cannot recommend them or any outside firms, but advise you to do your business with a broker who is a member of the Stock Exchange. 4. An obscure sheet run by parties with a very shady record. 5. It may be all right, but when having anything to do with a bank it is a good rule to err on the side of caution. For a deposit or other account you should select one of the leading well-established joint stock banks, which, by reason of years of the most cautious finance, are in a really strong position. Recent events should surely show the unwisdom of going, for the sake of higher interest or more favourable terms, to banks of the second or third grade—or no grade at all. 6. A begging-letter writer of that name is mentioned in the "Truth Cautionary List." Boylan.—1. A bucket-shop, and therefore to be shunned. 2. A system devised in the interests of the bucket-shop, which, of course, makes its gains out of its customers' losses. B. B. H.—See article in another column as to the Investment Registry. Bank.—1. See reply (No. 5) to "Blick." 2. Not so far as I am aware.

Cranbourne.—1. You can hardly expect to hear anything until the issue of the first report. The shares are obviously of a speculative character. They are not officially quoted, but your broker might be able to get a price. Crew.—Sell. Cestrian.— The exact position is at present impossible to determine, but the first debentures appear to be sufficiently secure. Carpenter. —Better hold. Cymro.—1. I have no information whatever respecting this firm. 2. I do not accept fees, but as you will see from Rule 2 additional questions can be asked if additional coupons are forwarded. If you will let me know your requirements I will suggest some investments. 3. I do not see it once in six months, so do not care to express an opinion.

Derwent.—1. See reply (No. 5) to "Blick." 2. A good office, but possibly for your purpose you might be able to do better elsewhere. Write in more detail for an answer under "Insurance." 3. The Post Office Savings Bank is expressly designed for this purpose, and you should use it rather than seek higher rates of interest with corresponding risks. Doubtful.—1. Yes. Deposit.—1 and 2. An excellent institution, but why not invest part at least of the money in some gilt-edged securities from which you would get a better return? D. D. C.—The T. Morton Harris bucket-shop shall be dealt with again in my Notes.

E. I.—They are merely a gamble, but may show some improvement within the next few months. E. M.—Thanks. I may use the points you mention when next I deal with this bucket-shop

Five Per Cent.—See reply (No. 5) to "Blick."

Green Heart.—No. 2 would make a sound investment. No. 1 is as yet an untried concern. Gwalia.—Hold for developments. Game.—Yes. Grasmere.—See article in another column.

Hussar.—1. A fair business risk. 2. Keep them. H. M. C. —I do not think that you are entitled to such papers or that it would be reasonable to expect companies to supply them. Think what it would mean in cases where great numbers of new shareholders are constantly being registered. Homo.—In view of the decisions Mr. Justice Channell has now given, McKinley Alexander and Son could defeat your claim by pleading the Gaming Act, as they have already done in two cases.

Infeliz.—See reply (No. 5) to "Blick."

J. B. B.—The failures were of local importance, and did not affect the institution named, which is in a very strong position. There is no need to disturb the money. J. C. W.—No doubt the advertisements of Cunliffe, Russell and Co. look enticing, but, as a matter of fact, their prices for such bonds are vastly in excess of their current market value, and when you came to sell you would find yourself a heavy loser. J. H. A.—My readers have frequently been warned against the so-called "Anglo-American Investment Trust."

Lex.—Keep them and await the meeting.

Nadir.—1. The prospectus is not a very informing document, and I should have recommended you not to buy. 2. A fair speculative investment. 3. City of London Electric 6 per cent. preference shares NAP.—See article in another column. NURSE.—I am afraid you can do nothing but await the course of the liquidation. It is not necessary to communicate with anybody but the Official Receiver. NEW READER.—1. Not the slightest chance; they now plead the Gaming Act, and it has been held that moneys paid to them are irrecoverable. 2-3. Both outside firms. Do your business with a broker who is a member of the London Stock Exchange.

OXO.—Amalgamated Press 5 per cent. cumulative preference would give nearly 4½ per cent., and the interest is well secured.

PETROL.—Both promising speculations. PELLEGRINA.—I believe it to be so.

QUASIMODO.—Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock.

RESOLVE.—You have the options open until 1913. Therefore, your course is to simply wait until 1913, and see whether it becomes worth your while to exercise the options.

S. J. W.—I cannot find that anything recent has been published relating to the concern, which is a stranger to me. STEEL.—I know of no special reason why they should be bought at present. SHEITTA.—1. They have been dealt with in consequence of complaints regarding their circulars, etc. 2. I cannot say; ask the secretary.

T. W. L.—Your claim as a depositor in the Charing Cross Bank should be sent in to the Senior Official Receiver, Carey Street, W.C. TOM.—See reply (No. 5) to "Blick." Be content with the Post Office Savings Bank, which gives you absolute safety. In such a case as yours that is far more important than the matter of interest. T. W. (Lancaster).—For your purpose, get particulars from the insurance office you mention, and also the Century Insurance Company, 18, Charlotte Street, Edinburgh. You might likewise apply to the building society you name, and to the National Freehold Land and Building Society, 25, Moorgate Street, E.C.

WAYFORD.—At the present price the shares ought to be worth holding. WILLIAM.—All oil shares are speculative, and those standing at such a price as you name would be mere gambling counters. WAKE UP.—I think your best course would be to make sure of what was left, and put it into some safe investment. W. N.—Of course, they are bucket-shop keepers, whose gains are made out of their customers' losses. W. M. F.—Thanks, I have a big collection of the flat-catching circulars of T. Morton Harris and Co.

ZUTPHEN.—As regards 2, if you thought the shares good enough to buy, why wish to sell before the company has had a chance of showing what it can do. The business is necessarily speculative, but, of course, you took this into account before purchasing.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

PROVINCIAL HOMES—IRISH PROVIDENT—LONDON AND PROVINCIAL—ROTTEN NATURE OF HOUSE-PURCHASE BUSINESS—IRISH PROVIDENT BONDHOLDERS SHOULD CUT THEIR LOSSES—UNFAVOURABLE PROSPECTS OF THE LONDON AND PROVINCIAL.

I HAVE been doing my best to obtain some clear idea of the status and prospects of three companies: they are the Provincial Homes Investment Company, Limited, the Irish Provident Assurance Company, Limited, and the London and Provincial Assurance Company, Limited. The Provincial Homes and the Irish Provident both have deplorable records, and they have now passed into the possession of the London and Provincial Assurance Company. As far as I can gather the London and Provincial gave two of its own £1 shares for each £1 share in the other two companies. This was done at a time when, I should judge, the shares of the Provincial Homes and of the Irish Provident had no value at all. The directors of the three companies are substantially the same, which is not to be wondered at, considering that the Provincial Homes and the Irish Provident are owned by the London and Provincial. I have received accounts for all three companies up to December 31, 1909, but it is not easy to obtain from these accounts any very clear idea of the working of the businesses. There are various transactions among the companies which tend to confuse the issues, and as these things go the end of last year is a relatively remote period.

WHY PAY RENT? Take an Immediate Mortgage, free in event of death, from the SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LIFE OFFICE. Repayments usually less than rent. Mortgage expenses paid by the Company. Prospectus from London Office, 3, Cheapside, E.C.

The particular purpose with which I started on my investigation was to ascertain what advice I ought to give to a number of my readers who are bondholders in the Irish Provident, and who have been invited to become bondholders or policyholders in the London and Provincial Assurance Company instead. I can quite certainly give one piece of advice without any hesitation, and that is that nobody, whether a subscriber of the Irish Provident, or the Provincial Homes, or an ordinary member of the public, should in any circumstances whatever take a bond or house-purchase certificate in the London and Provincial Assurance Company. These bonds, or certificates, as I have frequently explained, are mere savings bank transactions, the results under them are poor in the extreme even when subscriptions are paid throughout the full period; and the conditions in regard to surrender values, or the absence of surrender values, are preposterously disastrous. There are endless cases in which people have started paying for such bonds only to find themselves unable or unwilling to continue the payments, and then waking up to the unpleasant fact that they can get back no part of the premiums they have paid, or only some very small fraction of them.

These extremely bad conditions are inherent in the rotten system of bonds or house-purchase certificates. Neither the London and Provincial Assurance Company, nor any other company doing this class of business, is to be blamed unduly for insisting upon conditions which are more or less essential in a business of this kind; what they are to be blamed for is conducting such business at all.

There are two reasons why proper surrender values cannot be given, and these are also two reasons for not doing this class of business at all. The first is that very considerable expense is incurred in obtaining bondholders, collecting the premiums and managing the business. The consequence is that big deductions have to be made from the contributions of the members, and only a part of the contributions can be accumulated. The transaction is of a purely savings bank character. If the money paid for these bonds were put into the post office savings bank or paid for a sinking fund policy in a good company, all the money paid could be drawn out at any time, with interest in addition. When the money is paid for bonds or certificates, however, no part of it can be drawn out until after the payments have been kept up for some years, and then only a small proportion is available; frequently even that small proportion is not guaranteed, and it is at the option of the directors to give a surrender value or refuse it. Since a large percentage of the money has to be deducted for expenses, it is manifestly impossible to return the whole of it.

The second reason why the money paid by subscribers cannot be drawn by them when they want it is that these bond or house-purchase companies invest the bulk of their funds in advances on mortgage to some of their members. These mortgages cannot be called in, and the consequence is that the funds are locked up in securities that cannot well be realised, and sudden demands for return of deposits made by bondholders could not be complied with. Even if the security afforded by the London and Provincial Assurance Company were unimpeachable, I should urge my readers most emphatically to have nothing whatever to do with their bonds or certificates, whether by way of so-called "transfer" from the Irish Provident or in any other way. I am told by the managing director of the company that he shares my opinion about the unsatisfactory character of these bonds, and that his own idea of the work of this company is that it should be devoted to life assurance.

There remains the question whether bondholders in the Irish Provident would be well advised to continue their payments to the Irish Provident, or to discontinue paying to the Irish Provident and commence paying to the London and Provincial. Of course, the Irish Provident is the London and Provincial, since the latter company owns the former; but the liabilities of the Irish Provident can only be met out of the assets of the Irish Provident. So far as I can judge from the accounts up to the end of 1909, the assets amount to about one year's premium income, and, since most of the bonds are for short terms, there does not appear to be any possibility of the bonds being met in full, or anything like in full, at maturity; expensive litigation is still going on, and in all the circumstances I believe I am giving the best advice when I say that bondholders in the Irish Provident should cut their losses and pay no more, since if they do they will only be throwing good money after bad.

Proposals have been made to bond-holders in the Irish Provident to "transfer," as it is called, to the London and Provincial Assurance Company. Now, it seems to me that this talk of transfer is mainly nonsense. It seems improbable that a bond-holder in the Irish Provident who joins the London and Provincial retains any rights in the Irish Provident. I cannot see that any part of the Irish Provident asset can be assigned on his account to the London and Provincial any more than it can be assigned to anybody else or drawn by the bond-holder himself in cash. If an Irish Provident bond-holder is admitted as a policy-holder in the London and Provincial on any better terms than a member of the public who has never previously had anything to do with either one society or the other, it is merely because the London and Provincial thinks it worth while to pay some extra commission for getting the Irish Provident connection. Whether previous connection with the Irish Provident does, or does not, produce special terms for assurance in the London and Provincial, I feel reasonably certain that the best course for anybody who has unfortunately paid money to the Irish Provident would be to drop his Irish Provident bond altogether, and then take a life assurance policy on ordinary conditions in a first-class company rather than take a policy on special conditions—if they are special—in the London and Provincial.

I am not in a position to say whether or not the London and Provincial Assurance Company will, or will not, succeed in a future more or less remote; but it certainly cannot be regarded as fulfilling at the present time the first and fundamental condition of insurance, which is security. Until an actuarial valuation is made it is impossible to say whether its life fund and its endowment fund are adequate for meeting the liabilities to the policy- and bond-holders. Nearly the whole of its share capital has been expended in the establishment of the business, since the shares paid for the Irish Provident and Provincial Homes must be considered in this way; it seems extremely unlikely that more share capital will be forthcoming for so unpromising an enterprise, and it is not apparent that the premium income will suffice to pay the claims, and commission, and expenses, and to provide the necessary reserves for policy-holders and bond-holders. The company had its origin in the disasters and mismanagement of other companies with which the present management of the London and Provincial was concerned, and I cannot see that the career of the company up to the present time gives any indication that the management will be more successful with the London and Provincial than it has been with other enterprises.

Paw.—The company is sound and respectable, but you could do far better in most other recognised life offices. Karene.—Obtain your policy from the Clerical, Medical, and General, if you can, but if not, from the association you mention, which is quite sound. N. D. P.—United Kingdom Temperance or Scottish Widows' Fund. Roaipha.—Yes, I think the investment sound if you are content to wait some years for large dividends and great increase in value of shares; ultimately they are likely to be very good. Thuringia.—The company is sound and respectable, but see my article this week. Rats.—The Scottish Amicable is better than the office you name, though this, of course, is absolutely sound. Yam.—I cannot recommend the company you ask about; I may give my reasons in some detail in the near future. Wm. M. (Holbeach).—Respectable and safe, but the system is bad. See my article. Devolution.—In your circumstances you cannot do better than the Commercial Union. Cura Peculi.—The kind of policy you suggest is excellently suited to your purpose, but for the best results under such a policy you should go to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. Ask for particulars of new conditions in regard to sum assured remaining on deposit with the company till it is wanted. Enquirer.—Your best plan is to write to the office, stating the circumstances in detail. You may rely upon being thoroughly well treated, and if on hearing from the office you care to send me the correspondence I will give you any further advice or assistance I can. Avon.—Sacrifice your first premium and effect a policy in a first-class company, which the one you contemplate transferring to is not.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

PINNER'S FINANCIERS.

The statutory general meeting of the members of Pinner's Financiers, Limited, was held on the 27th ult., at the offices of the company, 39, Lombard Street, E.C., Mr. T. Makinson-Sanders presiding.

The Chairman said: I think it will be of interest if I give you some details of the property we have acquired in Madagascar, which has already been transferred to the company. This property consists of two estates, situated near the north-west coast of Madagascar, not far from the port of Majunga, whence there is a regular fortnightly service of steamers to Europe by the Messageries Maritimes line, with an occasional intermediate cargo service by a French line with headquarters at Havre. The two estates cover a total area of about 9,803 acres, one of them (known as Amelie) being about 17½ miles from the town of Marovoay, which town lies some thirty miles south-east of the port of Majunga, with which it is connected by a Government road and a service of steamers on the river or arm of the sea on which both towns are situated, while the second estate (known as Sainte Marie de Marovoay) adjoins the village of Ambolide, which is about 25 miles from Marovoay, a good road connecting the two estates. In addition to these two estates, our purchase includes a property of 4,900 square metres in the town of Marovoay, which contains a warehouse, for the collection and shipment of produce from the estates, after it has been brought down by ox-cart, a journey which, we understand, takes about eight hours, this time being probably that occupied in traversing the distance from the Amelie estate. The estates are situated about 105 metres (say, 320 ft.) above sea-level, the surface is undulating, and the soil apparently of a lime formation, black and red. The properties are freehold, and there are no rents or other charges payable to the Government or otherwise, with the exception of some fees, amounting to about 6,000f., which are payable to the Government in respect of the final title as to the Amelie estate. Continuing, the chairman said that for a long time past many attempts had been made to establish plantations of both Ceara and Para trees in the island, and it was eventually found that by following nature's method of seeding and replanting the saplings close together complete success was achieved. Last April the properties were inspected a second time by M. Perrier de la Bathie, a well-known botanist, who was accompanied by M. Drouhard, an official from the Agricultural Station. He then confirmed the opinion that he had previously expressed, and reported that the number of trees tappable this year would be 18,000; in 1911, 32,000; in 1912, a similar number; in 1913, 40,000; in 1914, about 400,000; and in 1915, about 1,500,000. He added a most important point that since the examination in 1908 they recognised that their estimate of the yield per tree must be raised from 126 grammes to 200 grammes (about ½lb.), a figure which again there was every reason to believe was still very much below the mark, as the company's agents in Majunga stated that M. de la Bathie admitted to them that his calculations were of an extremely conservative character. He (the chairman) disagreed with M. de la Bathie's estimate and number of trees tappable in 1911. In his opinion they should be able to tap in that year about 140,000 trees, as there were, according to the census, 340,000 trees from two to ten years old, taking the two estates together, of which 140,000 were from 2½ to ten years old. Ceara rubber trees could be tapped for the first time when they were from two and a-half to three years old. It was true that in four to six tappings the yield was only ½lb. of rubber per tree, but this would mean a great deal to the company, for they had about 100,000 trees from two and a-half to three years old, and towards the end of 1911 they would have a further 200,000 trees of the same age. In 1915, on M. de la Bathie's admitted conservative statement of only ½lb. of rubber per tree, the output of rubber from the 1,500,000 trees which he estimated would, even with rubber down to 3s. per lb., yield an annual profit of about £56,000. Apart from rubber the company had other sources from which they anticipated revenue, there being on the properties plantations of rafia, bananas, cacao, mandioca, potatoes, beans, rice (about 200 acres), grape-vines, and kapok. In conclusion, the Chairman said:—With regard to the question of labour, we understand that the supply is ample, the actual number of men employed on the estates at the beginning of this year being 76 residing with their families on the estates and 162 labourers living in the neighbourhood. With regard to the important question of the management of the estates, upon completion of the purchase we engaged Mr. Charles Hormess, who has had many years' experience of rubber plantations on the Congo, to proceed to Madagascar for the purpose of studying the whole position, in order that the board might be in a better position to decide on the course to be pursued in working the estates and developing the unplanted portions, which are, of course, considerable. Mr. Hormess arrived on the estates at the end of last month, and we have had a cable from him stating that he is fully satisfied that the property will be a great success with good management. We expect further news from him shortly. For the actual working management of the estates we propose to continue the services of the former owner and original planter, Mr. Sluzanski, to whose energy and perseverance the successful cultivation of Ceara ruber in Madagascar is due. His experience, extending over something like fifteen years, should, of course, prove an asset of great value, and, as you are aware, his interests in the company are very large. We have also an offer of services as commercial agents from Messrs. Lambert and De Bonal, of Majunga, a firm of rubber exporters of whom we have received a satisfactory account, and whose organisation at Majunga (which would be our port of shipment) will no doubt be of considerable assistance to us. To summarise our position, therefore, we have a freehold property of nearly 10,000 acres, the greater part of which appears to be suitable for the cultivation of rubber; we have something like a million and a half trees and saplings planted, ranging from old trees ten years or more in age down to saplings of one year's growth; we have a plantation of rafia—upwards of 50,000 palms—and a considerable area cultivated with what I may term local crops.

A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

GRAND CENTRAL (CEYLON) RUBBER ESTATES, LIMITED.

The statutory meeting was held on the 28th ult. at the Cannon Street Hotel, Mr. J. N. Campbell presiding.

The Chairman stated that the company was registered on July 4, and they received the certificate entitling them to commence business on August 13. The issue of 211,789 partly paid shares was very largely over-subscribed. The outstanding amount due on allotment was now reduced to £2,005, owing by shareholders outside the United Kingdom. In all probability the first call of 2s. 6d. per share would not be required until the early months of 1911. There was no doubt that the company had taken over a well-organised and well-managed undertaking of a very valuable nature. The transfer of the properties was proceeding, and would be completed within the next few days. They had every reason to believe that the prospectus estimates would be realised. With regard to the crops harvested, they had obtained 15,582 lbs. in July, 20,780 lbs. in August, 23,328 lbs. in September, and 24,550 lbs. in October. That gave a total for the four months of 84,200 lbs., against the estimate in the prospectus of 140,000 lbs. for the first six months. As November and December were usually the best cropping months in Ceylon, they had little doubt that the estimate would be realised. The total sales of rubber to date amounted to 33,109 lbs., of a realised value of £8,404. The total sales of tea to date amounted to 52,791 lbs., of a realised value of £1,443. With regard to the agreement between the company and the Ceylon and Eastern Agency, referred to in the prospectus, the material points were there mentioned—namely, an agreement of ten years' duration as the consignees and commercial agents and a fee of £1,000 per annum for providing office accommodation and clerks and the performance of the secretarial work. As the directors were interested in the agency, it might perhaps be thought that they could not be said to be acting in a quite independent position in executing this agreement for and on behalf of the company, although proper notice had been given in the prospectus. In view of that situation the directors now undertook to bring the agreement forward at the first annual general meeting of the company for confirmation at the hands of the shareholders. The rent of the offices and the expenses of the staff represented more than the amount of the fee. Their properties were spread over the districts of the Kelani Valley, Pelmadulla, and Galle in Ceylon, and were all within the rubber zone. The total acreage was 12,491, containing 2½ million trees in all. They felt that with a production cost of 1s. per lb., which they expected to realise, they were justified in their confidence in the future.

QUEER STORY.

A MURDERER IN THE BOX.

"NOT guilty, my lord."

The Assize Court was crowded. In the dock stood Arthur Stewart charged with the wilful murder of Sir Henry Meadow; in the gallery sacred to the grand jury sat Gladys Winter, scornful of circumstantial evidence, and breathing unspoken prayers.

Tempest, K.C., was for the defence; with him Gerald Wanstead. It was by no means the first case they had fought together, and Gerald inferred anxiety from his leader's stillness.

The jury were sworn, and counsel for the Crown rose. He spoke without heat and without enthusiasm, almost as a minister of justice—the conventional attitude when appearing for the prosecution; and yet, briefed for the defence, the same man had been known to make even court ushers attentive. But to-day his measured words were weighty enough. These were the central points of the case which he unfolded:—

On the evening of August 5, Arthur Stewart had dined with his guardian, Sir Henry Meadow, at Mintern Court. The only other guest was Sir Henry's nephew, Claude Meadow, an important but reluctant witness. At eleven p.m. the butler had found Sir Henry in the library stabbed to the heart—Claude Meadow insensible beside him. Arthur Stewart had disappeared. Claude Meadow, on being pressed, had admitted that Arthur had been the aggressor. Arthur had fled to France, where he had been arrested. The motive for the crime was terribly clear: owing to a quarrel Sir Henry had threatened to destroy a will under which Arthur largely benefited, and partly in fear of that, and partly in anger at the attitude of his guardian in the matter in dispute, Arthur had struck the fatal blow, afterwards attacking Claude, who came in unexpectedly, with the evident intention of putting him also out of the way.

The first witness called was the butler. He had gone into the library at half-past nine, as usual, with the whisky and soda. He had noticed that Sir Henry and Mr. Arthur were heated and angry with one another. He had heard a lady's name mentioned. At ten he was going back to the library, when he met the prisoner looking very white. The prisoner asked him to come and pack a small bag for him, telling him that Sir Henry did not wish to be disturbed again that night. At half-past ten the prisoner left with the bag on a motor-bicycle. At eleven o'clock witness was going his round, when he heard a sound of groaning in the library. He found the door locked. He broke it open and found his master stabbed and Mr. Claude just regaining consciousness. Mr. Claude had one wound in the upper part of the left arm.

Tempest started to cross-examine—very gently, very kindly. He elicited the fact that Claude and Arthur were both young men of about five and twenty; each of them had the run of the house. Sir Henry did seem fonder of Mr. Arthur. He had never known them quarrel before.

"And tell me," continued Tempest, "were you with Mr. Arthur all the time from when he came out of the library to the moment when he got on to his motor-bicycle."

"Yes, all of it."

"Has the key of the library ever been found?"

"Never, as far as I know."

"One wound only in Mr. Claude's arm I think you said?"

"Yes, only one."

Tempest sat down. A junior whispered to his fellow: "What's his giddy, jig-saw brain at now?" But that was the secret of the great leader's power. No theatrical bullying—no calling the gallery to see how clever he was, but each crucial question slipped in almost "when no one was looking," and yet at the end the complete puzzle solved.

The family solicitor followed. Sir Henry, he stated, had made a will four years before leaving the bulk of his large fortune to Mr. Arthur and a small amount to Mr. Claude. Four days previously he had received a letter from Sir Henry bidding him prepare another will.

"If Sir Henry had died intestate," asked Tempest, "was not Mr. Claude his sole heir and next-of-kin?"

"Yes."

"So that in the event of Sir Henry's death without a will, Mr. Claude would have had everything and Mr. Arthur nothing?"

"Yes."

"Your firm drafted that will four years ago?"

"Yes."

"Was it executed in duplicate?"

"Yes, we had two copies made, and Sir Henry signed both."

"And where were they kept?"

"One was kept by Sir Henry in a small locker in the library, the other by us."

"Do you know that a document was found burned in the grate of the library the night of the crime?"

"Yes."

"Was there enough of the document left for you to identify it?"

"Yes; it was undoubtedly the will—it had been engrossed by a clerk whose handwriting I know."

"You have told us that Sir Henry instructed you to alter his will. Did you have any conversation with him that explained to you the reason?"

The solicitor hesitated for a moment; and the girl in the gallery sat motionless as a stone.

"Yes, he told me of an attachment of which he disapproved formed by Mr. Stewart, and of his intention to alter his will if Mr. Stewart persisted. I think I ought to add that I know the objection was solely due to an old family feud, and had no personal reference to the lady in question."

There was almost a rustle of applause at this. The prisoner at the bar looked with gratified pride at the witness, but he forced his eyes not to glance at the gallery where Gladys Winter was aching with fright—for it seemed to her that every question Tempest asked only offered to the jury one more apparent proof that Arthur desired the old man's death before the will was altered.

"Tell me," said Tempest, quietly, "did Sir Henry, as far as you know, discuss the will with either of these two young men?"

"He had told Mr. Arthur of his intentions; but he told me himself that he did not mean to tell Mr. Claude anything about it. I saw him the afternoon of the crime, and he told me then that Mr. Claude knew nothing about the intended change, knew nothing, as far as he was aware, of the quarrel between him and Mr. Arthur."

A slight pause occurred while Claude Meadow was being summoned from the room outside the actual court where all witnesses in a criminal trial are kept in order that they may not hear any previous evidence or cross-examination. Tempest asked for a glass of water, and his junior noticed that his hand was not quite steady. He knew that meant overwhelming excitement; but Tempest's outward demeanour gave no sign.

Claude Meadow came in, and speaking with obvious reluctance told how he had been in the room when the quarrel began. Sir Henry had spoken in very bitter language about the lady. He had then taken the will out of the secret cupboard and told Arthur he was about to burn it; then he had left the room and gone into the garden. Witness heard high voices, but kept out of the way. At last he heard a cry. He turned to come up the long pathway leading to the French windows of the library. He saw Sir Henry take the will and walk towards the fire which was burning in the grate, the night being cold. Arthur seized a dagger on the table and leaped at Sir Henry, who closed with him, but as he did so let go his hold of the will, which fell into the fire. Sir Henry was stabbed before he could reach him. Prisoner then attacked witness. The latter was wounded. While they were struggling a slight noise was heard and prisoner released his grip. Witness knew no more till the butler brought him round.

Just as Tempest got up to cross-examine the solicitor instructing him passed him a note. Wanstead had not time to see its contents, but he noticed that for a moment Tempest stood absolutely lost in thought. The tension in the court was terrible. Arthur Stewart was a tremendous favourite, and yet here was this overwhelming motive for the crime—anger at Sir Henry's comments on Gladys Winter—fear of losing the money—in addition Claude's clear but reluctant evidence, and worst of all Arthur's flight to France.

"I have to ask you a few questions, Mr. Meadow." Tempest's voice was low but clear.

Claude bowed.

"I think you stood to profit by the destruction of the will?"

"Yes. I am afraid that was why Arthur was so eager to prevent it."

"The key of the library has never been found?"

"No, as far as I am aware."

"How many wounds do you say you suffered at the hands of the prisoner?"

"One only."

"You are sure?"

"Quite certain; he was disturbed by some noise before he had time to strike a second time."

"How were you dressed that evening?"

"In a dinner jacket."

"And I suppose a waistcoat—white shirt and vest. Had the vest long or short sleeves?"

"Short."

"And in order to cause the wound the dagger must have penetrated your coat sleeve and shirt sleeve—is that not so?"

"Certainly."

"Can you suggest any motive for the crime?"

"I would rather not."

"I am afraid I must ask you to."

"I suppose Arthur thought that if the will was burnt I should benefit."

"The clothes you were wearing that night are in court, I believe?"

"Yes, the police have them."

Tempest's manner had been almost apologetic while he was cross-examining Meadow, but Wanstead knew his leader was never more dangerous than in his silken moods.

"My lord," said Tempest, addressing the judge, "I should like the witness, with your lordship's permission, to put on the clothes he was wearing that night."

"Certainly, Mr. Tempest, certainly; let him retire and do so."

An audible gasp of excitement went round the court. Was it bluff, or had Tempest something in hand?

The witness returned, and Tempest, with the judge's leave, walked over to the box and looked at the clothes. There was a cut in the sleeve of the dinner jacket. Tempest took it and pinched it with his finger and thumb and could see the skin through a similar hole in the shirt.

"Now take off the coat."

Tempest took the coat sleeve in his hand and saw there was not one cut, but two of about a quarter of an inch in length running parallel about an inch apart from one another, thus / /.

"There are two slits here," said Tempest, quietly, letting the jury see them.

"Yes," answered the witness, without any interest.

"Caused by the dagger?"

"Yes—my sleeve must have been ruffled and the blade passed through two folds before it went into my arm."

"There was only one wound I think you said?"

"Yes, certainly."

Tempest walked back to his place, and his voice was stern as he put his next question.

"Mr. Meadow, did you know that Sir Henry's will had been executed in duplicate?"

"No, I didn't."

TRUTH CAUTIONARY LIST for 1910, 128 pages bound in cloth, price 1s. net, by post 1s. 2d., is now ready, and may be obtained from all booksellers and railway bookstalls.

"And that an executed copy was held by his solicitors?"

"No."

"Can you suggest any reason to me why Sir Henry should have burnt that will that evening when he knew there was another copy in existence?"

"Perhaps he did it to frighten Arthur."

"Would you take off that coat again, please?"

Claude did so.

"Can you explain to the jury how a dagger can go through two folds of a sleeve?"

"I have already told you"

"Listen, Mr. Meadow. If a man strikes a blow with a dagger at another man, the blade may penetrate one thickness of sleeve, or, if the sleeve be ruffled, three thicknesses; it cannot penetrate two."

The witness turned deadly pale.

"I don't understand that," he gasped.

"I put it to you, Mr. Meadow, that your wound was self-inflicted; that you first wounded your arm, then, desiring to complete it, you pulled the coat-sleeve of your coat and shirt away from your arm and stabbed them through. That would account for the hole in two thicknesses, not in one or three."

"It's a monstrous suggestion—absolutely untrue! There must have been two blows."

"But you told us there was only one."

"I must have been mistaken."

"But where was the corresponding wound?"

There was no answer. The silence was appalling. The audience suddenly realised a man was fighting for his life, but not the man they had come to see.

"You told me that the key of the library had never been found. Would you be surprised to hear it had been discovered in the pond in the garden at the back of the house?"

"What if it has?" Meadow turned as if at bay.

"Can you suggest how it got there? Mr. Stewart went out of the library, met the butler; the butler was with him till he motored off; all the garden gates were locked, and he has been in custody ever since his return from France."

There was no answer.

"Mr. Meadow," said Tempest, with terrible calmness, "I put it to you that your whole story is false. I put it to you that Mr. Stewart had gone before you ever came into the room; that on entering it you saw the will, the contents of which were known to you; that for years you have been brooding over the possibility of destroying it; and that, in ignorance of the fact that there was a duplicate, you deliberately murdered your uncle, burned the will, and then, to divert suspicion from yourself, you pretended you had been wounded."

There was no answer, for the witness had fainted.

BOOKS.

WE have at last at least an instalment of the long and eagerly expected "Life of Benjamin Disraeli: Lord Beaconsfield" (1), written so admirably—at once sympathetically and judicially—that it was well worth a delay which ensured at once political detachment and a thorough study and assimilation of the immense mass of material which Mr. Flavelle Monypenny had to digest. This material, as every one knows, was bequeathed by Lord Beaconsfield to Lord Rowton, who committed it to the keeping of the trustees of the Beaconsfield estate, and these, in turn, have wisely entrusted it to Mr. Monypenny's careful, competent, and judicious hands. What is the general impression which these opening chapters of the most romantic political career of the nineteenth century leave upon you? Perhaps the motto of "Vivian Grey" best expresses it:—

> "Why, then, the world's mine oyster,
> Which I with sword will open."

It would perhaps be too much to say that Disraeli in this and all his novels adopted not the motto only, but also the fustian and braggart style of mine Ancient Pistol; yet this at least is occasionally the impression of the sober Englishman. The sober Englishman often overlooks three things in his estimate of Disraeli: First, that he was more Eastern and Southern than British. In one of the most flamboyant outbursts Disraeli exclaims, and the very exclamation itself is Eastern and Southern:—"Oh, England! Oh my country, although full many an eastern clime and southern race have given me of their burning blood, it flows for thee!" Secondly, the sober Briton forgets that Disraeli's novels were only incidental to his career. He had early discovered what to-day every one knows, that the secret of success is advertisement. A pill, a poet, or a premier must be kept ever, so to say, on the hoardings to be a popular success. The third thing the Briton forgets in his estimate of Disraeli, especially as a novelist, is his sense of the legerdemain of mere words in imposing upon the public. Boileau says somewhere that "a mean or common thought expressed in pompous diction generally pleases more than a new or noble sentiment delivered in low or vulgar language; because the number is greater of those whom custom has enabled to judge of words than of those whom study has qualified to examine things." But indeed Disraeli himself puts something of the kind into the mouth of the Baron in "Contarini Fleming":—"Some silly book, Contarini, has filled your head with these ridiculous notions about the respective importance of words and ideas. Few ideas are correct ones, and what are correct no one can ascertain: But with words we govern men." If these words in his novels—with which in this first volume we chiefly have to do—are garish and grandiose, it is only because their author, being much more Eastern and Southern than British, is aiming at the most effective form at his command of popular advertisement. It is "the gorgeous East with richest hand showering barbaric pomp and gold" upon us, and is, indeed, the equivalent in literary style of Disraeli's style of dress at this time. Here is an entry from his friend, Meredith's, diary recording a dinner he gave Disraeli when he came to see him in London with the manuscript of that gaudy and grandiloquent piece of pretentiousness, "The Young Duke," in his pocket:—

> "March 29.—B.D. to dine with me. He came up Regent Street when it was crowded in his blue surtout, a pair of military light blue trousers, black stockings with red stripes, and shoes! 'The people,' he said, 'quite made way for me as I passed. It was like the opening of the Red Sea, which I now perfectly believe from experience. Even well-dressed people stopped to look at me.' I should think so!"

Again, writing to his father of his visit to Gibraltar, he says:—

> I have also the fame here of being the first who ever passed the Straits with two canes—a morning and an evening cane. I change my cane as the gun fires, and hope to carry them both on to Cairo. It is wonderful the effect these magical wands produce. I owe to them even more attention than to being the supposed author of—what is it?—I forget!

This to that grave and reverend seignior, his father! All this foppery and flashiness of style, whether of dress or of writing, seems to us foolish only because we forget it was meant to catch fools. "Fish not," say Gratiano to Antonio, "for this fool-gudgeon, this opinion," but to catch a fool-gudgeon you must use fools' bait. It looks foolish to see a man bait his hook for mackerel with a piece of scarlet cloth; but when he lands with it his fish he should seem a fool to you no longer. And it must not for a moment be forgotten that in Disraeli's case the garish scarlet of the cloth was not a dye, was not affected. It is the gorgeous East breaking out in him, as it breaks out in many a Jewess in my neighbourhood, who is so flecked with gold and decked with jewels that I am often reminded of the Irishman's exclamation on seeing a Hussar officer pass, plastered with gold: "Begor! I'd like to pawn him!" It breaks out also in the novels of Disraeli till some of their gorgeous scenes and also some of their fantastic personages recall Solomon's importations from Tarshish, "gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks."

But this coxcombry of style was far from indicating what it usually indicates in a Western—feebleness, fickleness, or facility—since beneath it in Disraeli was concealed Jewish pertinacity and patience, an undaunted resolution, and an indomitable courage. In "Vivian Grey" he says:—

> At this moment how many a powerful noble wants only wit to be a Minister, and what wants Vivian Grey to attain the same end? That noble's influence . . . Supposing I am in contact with this magnifico, am I prepared? Now let me probe my very soul. Does my cheek blanch? I have the mind for the conception, and I can perform most skilfully upon the most splendid of musical instruments—the human voice—to make these conceptions beloved by others. There wants but one thing more—courage, pure, perfect courage; and does Vivian Grey know fear?

To this undaunted courage, coupled with indomitable resolution, Disraeli owed it that he came at last to perform so successfully upon the most difficult of all instruments—human nature. "The secret of success," he said in a speech, "is constancy of purpose," while in a novel he writes, "Patience is a necessary ingredient of genius"; and to these two Jewish qualities no less than to his dæmonic cleverness and Titanic courage he owed the romantic triumphs of his career. What triumphs! He fought his way up against every prejudice, social, political, and religious; he broke down every barrier of race, creed, caste, and class; rose to be the leader of the party which had most distrusted him, the idol of the class which had most disdained him, the friend of the monarch who had most detested him, and, having been in his lifetime twice Prime Minister of the Empire, is now, a generation after his death, consecrated and canonised as a political saint!

In his "On the Wool Track" (2) Mr. Bean has packed an Australian guide-book as an expert packs a portmanteau, putting everything necessary in the smallest possible space, in the neatest possible way, and in the clearest possible order. He has done more than this: he has packed his book so that its unpacking is as interesting to the reader as the unpacking of a Christmas surprise hamper to a child; while his style is no less terse, clear and pregnant.

In "Rest Harrow" (3) Mr. Maurice Hewlett almost reconciles you to the world as it is by his presentation of a world whose ideal characters are Sanchia and Senhouse. Sanchia, who "fulfilled all the goddesses" (not omitting Venus), and Senhouse, who fulfilled all the philosophers (not omitting Heraclitus The Obscure) are such uncomfortable and uncontrollable creatures that you are relieved at the close of the novel to find them wedded to each other—not without, however, the misgiving of Jaques "this loving voyage is but for two months victualled."

In "Sacrifice" (4) Mrs. Penny vividly depicts Indian life generally and particularly the horrors of Indian devil-worship. The devil worshipped by the Khonds is the Earth Goddess, Tari Pennu, who demands a human sacrifice done horribly to death. The rescue of Indra, who had devoted himself to this death but at the last moment had lost heart, is thrillingly described; but Mrs. Penny might have spared us the sacrifice in his stead of the wretched girl who loved him. The Anglo-Indian scenes of this cleverly constructed novel are also admirably described, and you close it with a sense of having acquired an intimate knowledge of the Indian native, of his masters, and of their mutual relationships.

The delineations of Spanish life and character in "Dear Loyalty" (5)—a story which turns upon the theft of a lottery ticket—are fresh and clear. From a prince of the Church (of whom, by the way, we see too little) to a simple peasant girl whose lottery ticket has been stolen from her by a dissipated youth of high rank, all the characters are natural, while the scenes of the novel seem steeped in the atmosphere of Spain.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Messrs. Macmillan will have ready this week Sir Charles Bruce's important work, "The Broad Stone of Empire: Problems of Crown Colony Administration." Sir Charles writes as an administrator of long and varied experience—he has been colonial secretary in Ceylon and governor of Mauritius, British Guiana, and the Windward Islands—and his account of the system of government in the Crown Colonies is largely based on official documents.

Mr. Edward Fothergill, the author of "Five Years in the Sudan," was formerly an official there and able to study the country from the inside. He records the astonishing changes that have taken place during recent years, and gives, too, an account of his sporting expeditions in quest of elephant, lion, and antelope. The book, which is illustrated, is being brought out by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett.

Mr. E. V. Lucas has given the happy title of "The Second Post" (Methuen, 5s.) to the new anthology of letters which he presents as a supplement to "The Gentlest Art." It is as delightful a book as its predecessor, and one cannot give it higher praise than this.

Some notable new editions of Stevenson are announced by Messrs. Chatto and Windus. One volume will be the "Prayers Written at Vailima," with each prayer illuminated in missal style by Alberto Sangorski, and the whole reproduced in colour upon ivory-tinted paper. In the Florence Press series "Virginibus Puerisque and Other Essays" will be issued, printed in the type designed by Mr. Herbert Horne, with twelve illustrations in colour after water-colour drawings by Norman Wilkinson. Reprints in pocket form of "Father Damien" and "Talk and Talkers" are also being published. "Father Damien" has not been issued in separate form since the original editions of 1890, which have long been out of print. "Talk and Talkers" is one of the essays in the volume entitled "Memories and Portraits."

Mr. Fyvie's new volume of eighteenth century vignettes, "Noble Dames and Notable Men of the Georgian Era," is shortly to be published by Messrs. Constable. One of the noble dames is Lady Mary Coke, whose story is told as far as possible in the letters of Horace Walpole, and the others are the Countess of Strathmore and Elizabeth, Lady Holland. Sir Henry Bate Dudley, Bamfylde-Moore Carew, and Abraham Tucker are the notable men of whom Mr. Fyvie writes. "Pages from the Book of Paris," which Messrs. Constable are also issuing, is the work of two young Americans. It is written by Mr. Claude G. Washbourne and illustrated with 44 etchings and drawings by Mr. Lester G. Hornby.

Mr. Haldane has written an introduction to a volume on "Compulsory Service," which Mr. Murray will issue immediately. The volume deals with the needs, the cost, and the qualities of the British Army in comparison with those of other armies, and makes an elaborate examination of the whole question of conscription in its application to this country.

"The Child's Inheritance: Its Scientific and Imaginative Meaning" is the title of a book by Dr. Greville Macdonald which Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. have ready this week. The author's intention is to stimulate inquiry as to whether we are at present entirely upon right lines in our systems of education, as well as to inspire a feeling of optimism concerning the possibilities of a truer understanding of the magnificence of the child's native equipment. Major Grumlier Parry's new book, "The Pageant of May Day," is also being issued by Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co.

For the forthcoming centenary biographical edition of Thackeray, Lady Ritchie has rearranged her biographical prefaces to her father's works, and added many new letters and illustrations, together with some of his writings not hitherto published. The edition will consist of twenty-six volumes, and the first two, containing "Vanity Fair," will be issued by Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. on the 15th inst.

So many books about Spain have appeared of late that the title of a volume announced by Mr. Arnold is sure to challenge attention. It is called "Unexplored Spain," and the authors, Messrs. Abel Chapman and Walter J. Buck, are two veteran sportsmen who for nearly forty years have been familiar with wild parts of the country which are still but little known. Some of the ground they describe has indeed been untrodden by any Englishmen but themselves. The illustrations, which are a special feature of the volume, include some interesting photographs by the Duke of Orleans.

The first volume of the new and enlarged edition of the "Encyclopædia of Sport and Pastimes," edited by the Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire, has now been published (price 10s. 6d.) by Mr. Heinemann. The articles extend from "Aeronautics" to "Cricket," and there are many illustrations, including colour-plates.

ART.

OLD MASTER WORSHIP.

THE dividing-line between the artistic and the non-artistic pleasures of an old master is often very difficult to distinguish, if, indeed, it be not practically invisible. Theoretically, of course, a picture gives pleasure merely by its existence, and independently of its date, painter, value, or style. Actually the facts that a higher price attracts a larger number of visitors than a lower one, that upon its authorship, as apart from its merit, depends the amount of appreciation from a great many more, and that, finally, its idiosyncrasies, historic or otherwise, make a powerful appeal to a select minority, enhance considerably the difficulty of ascertaining its artistic value. In the meantime, the "old master" invariably evokes a thrill, whether from sheer old-masterliness or from the sufficiency of dirt that obscures it.

Messrs. Shepherd's winter exhibition of early British and foreign schools at their galleries in King Street offers an almost unique opportunity for studying the artistic value of the old master. Apart from the small Crome, the Zoffany portrait of Dr. Locke, and a small Raeburn, all pictures of the first rank, the exhibition contains pictures in which the historic, the personal, and other interests respectively preponderate. Here you may see a charming portrait of as well-known a character as Lady Mary Montagu, a portrait of "Mrs. Deans," which, by a certain commonplaceness, shows how narrow is the space between talent and genius; "A Court Lady," by Coello, with an almost unique head-dress; a portrait of Sir Thomas Overbury, over-soft in character, but showing him wearing in his ear-ring a lock of his lady's hair, by Mytens; a Hogarthian "Elizabeth Affleck," by Vanderbank; an early Romney; a very German-looking "Duke of Medina-Celi," attributed to the Spanish school. In none of these is the strictly and solely artistic attraction to the fore. At the same time, the whole effect on the beholder is one of pleasure, repose, and satisfaction rarely gained in a modern gallery even from our best painters.

In the first place the term "early master" predisposes us strongly in favour of any picture by removing it bodily from the range of the small-shot of prejudice; there are fashions in old masters as in new, but the personal element is thus more or less neutralised. Further, old masters are sufficiently unlike ourselves and our conceptions for us to be able to see them clearly as naïve, sincere, pompous, artificial, or what not. Finally, time has mellowed them, good or indifferent, and attuned them to a civilisation, which more than ever in these days of sepia reproductions, has lost its sense of colour. Thus oldness or deadness has certain real advantages, which are not those merely of a fashion or a pose.

The whole of the exhibition at the King Street galleries, indeed, teems with interest and suggestiveness. Mary Beale, the notable pupil of Lely, shows her master in the "Countess of Rochester," herself in the much stronger "Basilea"; speculation can wander at will over the question whether Gainsborough's "Portrait of a Lady" be that of Mrs. Tickell; two beautiful Cromes offer opportunities of comparison between the bold mellowness of the one, the fine feeling and composition of the other; an early Wilson, an early Romney, and an early Constable—this last somewhat crude in design, but showing admirably his use of the red ground colour in his sky—allow the visitor to trace the path eventually followed by each painter. The whole exhibition, indeed, is one more instance of the fine standard which Messrs. Shepherd have made it for many years their business to maintain.

The one-man show at the Baillie Gallery seems likely to become a perpetual quartet. Of the four shows, that of Madame Erna Hoppe is rightly in the front room. At first sight her work has the essentially unfinished look, which, if used spontaneously, shows character more perhaps than any other medium, but which, if merely imitative, is only an excuse for lack of finish. It says much for Madame Hoppe that such works as "The French Baby," together with a galaxy of other babies, the little "Calvaire Breton," "Fisher Children," and the more ambitious "Orchard Girl" quite justify her convention by their fullness of suggestion and charm of feeling. There is a certain emptiness in the left-hand corner of the "Orchard Girl" which might well have been empty without so appearing, but the whole conception is delightful, and is for the most part excellently carried out. Mr. Newell Marshall is exhibiting some spirited water-colours of "Life in Cairo and the East," which show him a past-master of camel ambulation and the possessor of a keen eye for colour.

* * * * *

The illustration of Carlyle's "French Revolution" (Chapman and Hall, 21s. net), by Mr. Edmund Sullivan, offers food for thought as to the limitations of illustration generally. For the most part Mr. Sullivan has translated Carlyle's very figurative language quite literally into pictures; the rest of the illustrations consist of characteristic portraits of the numerous men of the time. In his treatment of the hydra-headed monster, Mr. Sullivan is inclined to be somewhat platitudinous; slime and claws and hairy arms need a hyper-original outlook to be effective. Now and again, however, as in the "Falling Splendour" of the tennis court oath, or in the "Flourishing of the Fleur de Lys," he rises to the true sphere of allegory, and justifies himself for attempting the impossible. Dealing with definite personalities he proves his very real power of grasping a situation as a whole. His "Titan" shows Mirabeau bearing upon his back an incompetent Royal Family; the "Latest Portraits of Celebrities"—a windowful of heads on pikes—gives a painfully vivid realisation of the Terror. On the whole Mr. Sullivan has extended the boundaries of illustrations, and that in spite of the fact that the most successful illustration of "The French Revolution" was bound to have something in common with a Pyrrhic victory.

MUSIC.

THE ENCORE NUISANCE.

THE encore nuisance is a standing exemplification of the truth of the adage that it is possible to have too much of a good thing. Yet, undesirable as the system is, and grievously as it is abused on occasion, the desire to hear a piece or a performer again is common to all at times. Ultimately, I suppose, it is the vanity of the artist which is responsible for the encore evil. If performers would only have the strength of mind to resist the blandishments of their admirers the nuisance would quickly die a natural death. As it is only the few have the courage to do this, and so the practice obtains. Doubtless circumstances alter cases, and some encores are more defensible than others. In the case, for instance, of a one-man recital, if the performer chooses to give some extra pieces and the audience is willing to hear them no one need object, especially if they come at the end of the programme when no one need stay unless he wants to. In this connection the sensible proposal has been made that all encore pieces should be held over till after the advertised programme has been completed. Then the insatiables could remain and enjoy themselves, and those who had had enough could depart without having missed anything that they had come to hear. Nor could anyone reasonably complain of an arrangement so obviously fair to all. Yet I have a shrewd impression that the number of encores given would be marvellously reduced if this plan were adopted.

Of course, the existing system is æsthetically bad. A work repeated almost inevitably falls flat the second time. Now and again, perhaps, a great artist will contrive to vary his reading of a given work so ingeniously as to impart an element of freshness to each rendering, but in the ordinary way an encore performance of a work serves merely to bring into relief its weaker features. But even so when encores are given simple repetition is the sound rule, if not on artistic, at least on public grounds, for what the noisy minority usually wants is not the same work over again, but another one altogether. In fact, they want more than they have paid for, and this without regard to the rights of the artist concerned, of his fellow-artists, or of the audience at large.

Audiences themselves, by the way, are often very weak, and will allow themselves to be led by the nose by a handful of selfish partisans who could be easily suppressed by a sufficiently vigorous demonstration of disapproval. Unless an encore is demanded by an overwhelming majority of the audience it is an intolerable outrage. Occasionally concert managers will make valiant efforts to combat the evil. Even a ballad concert audience was invited a year or so ago to co-operate to this end—the request being made that the audience would not persist in demanding an encore after the performer had been summoned to the platform three times. For a time the audience respected it. Then one performer gave way, and thenceforward the audience, having tasted blood once more, the manifesto became a dead letter. The Philharmonic directors have also put forth solemn appeals on the subject at various times, but with only indifferent success. Not long ago, for instance, a well-known pianist was allowed to play two extra pieces, to the annoyance and inconvenience of many people who wished the advertised programme to be proceeded with; while in the case of another Philharmonic concert, at which Kubelik was one of the soloists, the parts for an encore piece were actually placed on the desks of the orchestra beforehand! When this sort of thing is done by the authorities themselves, who shall wonder that appeals to the audience are addressed to deaf ears?

In the case of certain performers encore pieces are, of course, often frankly stipulated for and arranged beforehand, and before now they have even been printed in the programme as pieces which Mr. or Mme. So-and-So "will sing in the course of the evening." Such an arrangement has at least the advantage of preventing possible misunderstanding. The famous old double bass player Dragonetti had a disconcerting way with him in this matter. When managers asked him to give an extra piece he adopted the formula, "Very good; but if I play encore you pay encore." It is a pity that more artists have not the courage to stand on their rights in the same way. Sims Reeves, in his later years, never dreamed of singing any extra pieces beyond those which had been expressly contracted for, and when towards the end of his career some one showed him the report of a concert given thirty years before at which he had sung any number of encores, he exclaimed, "I must have been stark mad." But it was a form of madness which is unfortunately only too common.

Mr. Beecham continues to provide excellent fare at Covent Garden. Seldom before, indeed, have such fine performances been given at such reasonable prices in London. Naturally, however, they vary to some extent in point of quality. Last week brought Mozart into the bills in the shape of "Don Giovanni" on Thursday and "Le Nozze" on Saturday. Mozart, who sounds so simple, imposes none the less a severe tax on his interpreters. No composer, indeed, shows up weak places more mercilessly, and neither of the performances in question could be reckoned quite ideal. In the one Signor de Luca as the Don and Miss Ruth Vincent as Zerlina were the most successful, while in the other Miss Beatrice La Palme as Susanna and Mr. Lewys James as Figaro carried off the principal honours. Miss Maggie Teyte sang pleasingly also as Cherubino, but she never seemed to lose her identity in the part or to realise that it should be played in a blithe and saucy spirit.

Concerts of late have not been very numerous or important. It was regrettable not to see a better attendance at Ysaye's recital on Wednesday. But even the greatest artists nowadays must expect, apparently, to play to poor audiences at times. At the Bechstein Hall on the same afternoon the Classical Concert Society had three fine soloists in Messrs. Pablo Casals, Leonard Borwick, and Gervase Elwes, all of whom gave of their best. Some very enjoyable chamber music was heard also at a pianoforte and violin recital given by Miss Mary Cracroft and Miss Zoë Pyne (Mrs. Oliver Madox Hueffer) who brought forward among other things some unfamiliar Bach pieces, which they played with fine musicianship and infectious enthusiasm.

Further particulars which have been published as to Strauss's recent dispute with the Dresden opera authorities suggest that there is more to be said for his attitude than appeared at first. In fact, in the manifesto which he has published on the subject he proves himself a shrewd controversialist. He lays stress in particular on the one-sided character of the usual arrangement between composer and opera manager, whereby the latter agrees merely to produce a work, but gives no assurances whatever as to when the work will be produced or how, and retains the right, therefore, to spoil its chances utterly, if so disposed, by mounting or casting it injudiciously, by giving it too seldom or too often, or by otherwise acting ill-advisedly. Strauss claims, and not unfairly, that the composer is entitled also to a voice in these matters. As to the argument that the management may be safely left to do the best for a work in its own interest, he laughs at this naïve notion, and urges, on the contrary, that the real way to make a manager adopt this course is to increase his financial responsibility. Altogether Strauss makes it clear once more that in his own case the artistic temperament and shrewd common sense are by no means incompatible.

THE THEATRES.

ROOKIES AND LIARS.

THERE has been a brief lull in theatrical matters during the past week, and nothing of any great moment happens until Mr. George Edwardes opens the newly constructed Adelphi on Saturday with "The Quaker Girl." Vast changes have been made in this theatre, and from being one of the least attractive houses in London it will now be found to be one of the handsomest and most luxurious. Within the past few days, though, I have been appreciating, more or less, two phases of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's talent. I have seen the revival of "The Liars" at the Criterion, and also his little play "Fall in, Rookies" at the Alhambra. With regard to the first, I never really tire of seeing it, because, at its best, it is a most brilliant piece of comedy writing. The third act is a triumph of ingenious construction and witty writing, and the development of the scene, showing first one and then another person being drawn into the network of lies with which Lady Jessica hopes to deceive her husband is masterly. I sometimes wonder, however, how it is that the Mr. Jones who can rise to such heights can also write the fatuities which he puts into the mouth of Mrs. Ebernoe, the widow on whom

Sir Charles Wyndham, in the character of Sir Christopher Deering, lavishes his devotion. I feel sure that she is meant to be very charming, but she is a mournful soul, always maundering about her lost husband to the man who she knows will be her future husband, and explaining that her one ambition is to drink deeply of the cup of self-sacrifice. People who pant for self-sacrifice are invariably maddening creatures. Again, the final reconciliation between Lady Jessica Nepean and her husband always irritates me. Does Mr. Jones really think that deep-seated matrimonial troubles are smoothed away by good dinners? If a husband has wronged his wife, as in "Rebellious Susan," the curtain falls on their going in to a good dinner. In "The Liars" Lady Jessica's divagations are condoned with a dinner, and so on. All this part is unworthy of the rest of a play which contains the best comedy scenes that have been written in our time. Sir Charles Wyndham's Christopher Deering remains a delightful performance, and Miss Moore is charming as the "flirtatious" Jessica. Mr. Sam Sothern now plays Mr. Vane-Tempest's old part of Freddie Tatton, the man who "may be an ass" but is sure that he is not a "silly ass;" while I was delighted to see Mr. Alfred Bishop once more as the ineffable Coke. In spite of the few captious remarks that I have made above, "The Liars" is a play that I think I enjoy more every time I see it, and in the twelve years since it was first produced I have seen it more times than any comedy I know.

"Fall in, Rookies!" shows quite another side of Mr. Jones's talents. Here there is no subtle ingenious dialogue or skilfully built up scene, but a strong direct little tale in which a moral is driven home with unerring blows. It is interesting to me because it shows that the author has rightly gauged music hall audiences. When he wrote "The Knife" for the Palace Theatre he had not done so. The latter was the better written play, but "Fall in, Rookies!" will succeed where the other failed. The moral of the play is that there is nothing like military training for drunkards and wastrels, and so we are shown Mr. Farren Soutar at a village inn drinking himself into imbecility. Here he is found by his embittered old mother, who tells him that he has brought the home to ruin even as his father did before him, and so Mr. Soutar comes up with a round turn and enlists. In the second scene he comes back a smart soldier, full of patriotic fire, and now worthy to marry the village innkeeper's daughter, whom he had insulted and kissed in scene one. Two Stiggins-like anti-militarists who come on are sent to the right about by him, and here you have a vigorous little preachment in favour of military service. Into the advisability of military training for all young men I do not propose to go in this article, but I fancy that the enthusiasm with which the sketch is greeted nightly proceeds largely from those who think that universal military training would be an excellent thing—for others. When I was there I saw Lord Roberts looking on with evident approval, doubtless welcoming Mr. Jones as a valuable recruit to the cause which he has at heart. I very much question, however, whether stage sermons on militarism do any lasting good. London went mad for a time over "An Englishman's Home," but from all I hear now the number of recruits for Territorials is diminishing. What I really wondered at the end of the play was whether Mr. Soutar would continue to defend his country or whether he would settle down as the consort of the innkeeper's daughter, pretty Mrs. Leslie Faber, and spend the rest of his days drawing pots of ale for thirsty villagers and wastrels such as he had been himself three years earlier. By the way, in the final scene, when you see the hero's regiment marching through the village, I think that the Alhambra management, with its unrivalled resources, might have given us something more in the way of a military display. The dozen or so of men made but a feeble show.

I have received an interesting letter from Mr. Lyddell Sawyer with reference to some remarks which I made a short time since about the newly constructed English Play Society. Mr. Sawyer has now sent me one of the standard examination forms which the society's examiners will fill in when they award marks. In these forms the qualifications which a play may be expected to possess are classified under twenty different headings covering plot, construction, dialogue, characterisation, and so forth, and he contends among other points:—

"That the habit of having always to gauge the merits or demerits of various plays under the same recognised set of conditions is found to be an excellent analytical basis of training to the mind, and, moreover, the opportunities and usage of comparing the detail worth of one play against another by this method is found to be both instructive and otherwise valuable."

I am not particularly concerned with training the minds of the examiners; I am more anxious to know who the actual judges or examiners will be, but I am glad to hear that the society already holds "a large number of letters from authors thanking us for the help they have received through this method of examination." Well, I wish the venture every success.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

THE result of the Cambridgeshire affords additional proof that our handicap horses are an exceedingly moderate lot. Christmas Daisy won with the most extreme ease, and if he had been out of the way then Whisk Broom would probably have been successful. Christmas Daisy was very heavily backed at the finish, and he started at 7 to 1, although 100 to 6 had been vainly offered against him on Tuesday night. I see that Mr. Purefoy is congratulated on having "engineered" four successes in the Cambridgeshire with two horses within seven years. Hackler's Pride won as a three-year-old with 6 st. 10 lbs. and as a four-year-old with 8 st. 10 lbs. Why was not last week's winner similarly put up in the handicap? Of course, if Christmas Daisy had been known to be in his last year's form he would have been a very hot favourite, as nothing in the race was likely to beat him, but he ran nowhere in the spring for the Lincolnshire Handicap and for the City and Suburban, and later on he took part in a hurdle race at Auteuil. It had been generally put about that Islington Green would be the best from this stable. I have several times pointed out that it is the imperative duty of handicappers to treat horses on their best form and not on their worst. After the hollow victory of Christmas Daisy last year it was preposterous to give him such a weight as 8 st. 2 lbs., for only a pure-bred mooncalf or gomeril could attach the slightest importance to this horse's defeats earlier in the year. Christmas Daisy would not have been stopped by another stone, and he is not a horse that will be associated with clever handicapping, as last year he carried a penalty of 10 lbs. over and above the ridiculous weight which had originally been allotted to him. Lord Carnarvon must have felt disgusted to find Mustapha placed 3 lbs. above Christmas Daisy, seeing that last year his horse was giving only 2 lbs. when he was beaten by five lengths (which might have been ten), and he started favourite. The Story, who had been a great public fancy, was scratched, to the relief of the numerous bookmakers who had laid double-event bets, as Mr. Joel's horse had been extensively coupled with Verney. Rhodora and Thalia were never fairly in the race, as both mares got off badly. The victory of Rhodora would have been a remarkable achievement, as nobody has ever heard of a mare being relegated for a season to the stud and then coming back to the turf and winning an important race.

Electra was very firm in the betting, although she had not been quite liked in some of her recent gallops. I could not see this mare's chance after her hollow defeat at Manchester. She looked remarkably well, but she appeared unable to go the pace, and she was never dangerous. Several good judges at Newmarket were of opinion that Electra would be chopped at the start, as she is not a quick beginner. Halcyon was the hope of many clever people, who had overlooked the fact that he has usually beaten horses of only moderate class. He seemed to be decidedly overweighted. When a horse's form in being considered seriously in view of an important race it is necessary to take into account the class of his opponents a great deal more than the style in which he has won his races. Abelard II. was perhaps the sensational horse of the Cambridgeshire, and all kinds of the most crackbrained reports had been circulated about him. It must have been obvious to anyone who remembered the English form of this horse that if he was really a good thing for last week's race he must have made a truly miraculous improvement. He was said to have been backed to win over £100,000, but nobody could possibly have backed any horse in the race to win one tenth of that sum, and with the animal still standing at 50 to 1! Such preposterous fairy tales are constantly circulated by anserous gobemouches. I can remember a Cambridgeshire winner which started at 40 to 1, and yet something like £50,000 was won over this horse. There is no such betting in these days. Greenback, with 8 st. 4lbs. was palpably overweighted, and although a sporting writer considers that Lord Villiers was "a bold sportsman" to start his colt, yet boldness is not always judicious, and everyone whose view is worth an oyster shell will be of the opinion that he made a mistake. The placings in the Cambridgeshire need not be regarded, as Christmas Daisy had the race in hand at the Bushes. The fact is that he got away in front, and made all the running, never being fairly tackled. Both the Newmarket handicaps have been won by "walking in" horses, as Verney and Christmas Daisy had each about a stone in hand.

The Stewards of the Jockey Club certainly cannot be congratulated upon the slovenly performance of their handicappers, and another unsatisfactory feature in races of this class is that while some horses are carelessly thrown in, others are invariably weighted up to the very top of their form. If one horse is to be treated on its best running, why on earth is another to have its winnings ignored and only defeats be taken into account. There is scarcely a week now of the season without some flagrant case of scandalously bad handicapping. The practical lesson which backers may learn from last week's race is that the only sensible system is to wait until the last. Christmas Daisy and Mustapha finished first and second, and it was only a few days before the race was run that either horse was seriously backed. I see it is announced that "a large fortune" was won over the race—which is moonshine, for no great stake could possibly have been won.

The Middle Park Plate form cut up badly when Borrow was beaten cleverly by Sandwich for the Criterion Stakes, Prince San, who started favourite, finishing third. Borrow looked jaded, and he had probably not recovered from the effects of his severe race ten days previously. There was a poor field for the Moulton Stakes, and Meleager was an absolute certainty on public form, so the bookmakers were generous in accepting moderate odds. The fielding was for Porphyrio, but it seemed nonsensical to expect this colt to beat Meleager at 12 lbs. after his wretched running with Mushroom. This would have been a really important race if Stedfast had started, but Lord Derby's colt is not to run again this year, which is a very wise decision. King William was made a great favourite for the Dewhurst Plate, but he could only achieve a dead-heat with Phryxus. Lord Derby's colt is still backward, and he was certainly unlucky not to win. The poor performance of Prince Palatine was a great disappointment to his friends, and Mr. Pilkington's colt had been heavily backed, as he was much fancied. He was meeting the dead-heaters at 10 lbs., whereas in the Middle Park Plate King William was receiving 4 lbs. from Borrow (including the gelding's allowance), and 7 lbs. from Seaforth and from Pietri. The last seven furlongs of the R.M. is a severe course over which to give a lot of weight away, and Prince Palatine was done with at the Bushes. However, the two year-old form is in a hopeless tangle, and if all goes well with Lord Burgoyne then M. E. Blanc ought to win the Derby, as the English lot are evidently very moderate. I expect Seaforth is the best of our two-year-olds, but he is not engaged in the Derby. Mushroom is evidently quite at the top of the tree, as was demonstrated by his excellent performance during the Second October Week, and on Thursday he cantered away with the Richmond Nursery, giving 21 lbs. to Ilia, who had been well galloped. It is much to be regretted that Mushroom has no good engagements. If he can stay next June Mr. Baring ought to win the Gold Vase at Ascot.

There was some heavy gambling over Charlemont and Abattis for the Jockey Club Cup, but both ran badly, and Lagos won cleverly from Royal Realm. Maher rode a very fine race on the winner, who is a really good stayer, but he has become fearfully uncertain. I gave a plumper for Willonyx for the Free Handicap, and he just won from Thalia, who lost ground at the start. She is a bad beginner. Most of the clever people backed Merry Jack, who had been a great tip for the race all the week.

The easy victory of The Story in the Durham Handicap excited an outburst of vituperative howling from those who had backed Mr. Joel's horse for the Cambridgeshire. On The Story's running with Mustapha it may justifiably be assumed that he could have finished second to Christmas Daisy, but I do not a bit believe he could have won the race. It seems as if Buckwheat would have been a better representative of the Whatcombe stable in the Cambridgeshire than Mustapha, calculating through the Kempton form. It was The Story's first success since he won the Durham County Produce Plate at Stockton more than fourteen months ago.

Next week will be divided between Lincoln and Liverpool, and large fields may be expected for most of the races at both meetings. The "back-end" is usually a Moscow campaign for backers, who will do well to exercise extreme caution in thin transactions. Lord Derby will give the Lancashire people a sight of Swynford in the Liverpool St. Leger on Wednesday.

IMPERIAL AMATEUR OARSMEN—O.U.B.C.—FOOTBALL.

The other week I said that there would be a Canadian crew at Henley next year for the Grand—to wit, "The Ottawa Senior Eight." Now, betwixt our Amateur Rowing Association and colonial and foreign associations there is often trouble because of the A.R.A.s definition of an amateur oarsman, which excludes those engaged in manual labour. Years ago, in 1894, when the rules were under revision, I argued in favour of its abolition. Subsequent troubles with the Americans made me consider that, illogical and arbitrary as it was, it served its purpose in that it excluded a certain section of undesirable Americans, and that, therefore, the end justified the means. Now I am inclined to go back to my original views, and the reason is that the definition of the Canadian Association of amateur oarsmen is framed on lines that exclude the undesirable, whether he is engaged in manual labour or not. To understand the definition and to appreciate its import one must realise that it is framed to meet the condition of affairs that might have arisen in Canada, and certainly were and are prevalent in the so-called amateur circles of the United States in every branch of sport. It was necessary to provide against the "shamateur"—the man who got his college or university education because he was a good baseball player, football player, runner, or oarsman. Then there was the man, often a collegian, who was and still is picked up by the rival athletic clubs who bargain with athletes to represent them on terms which do not make them professionals within the meaning of the act. The chief offenders in this respect are the Irish American A.C. and the New York A.C. The inducements offered are free board at the training homes, cancellation of dues, and a good paying position with little work attached during the summer months. This practice is hit on the head by the Canadian definition, which I proceed to give in detail, as it may interest shall consist of clubs which adopt the definition of an amateur, viz., to be one who has not entered into an open competition, or for either a stake, public, or admission money; or an entrance fee; or competed with or against a professional for any prize; who has never taught, pursued, or assisted in the pursuit of athletic exercise as a means of livelihood; whose membership of any rowing or athletic club was not brought about, or does not continue, because of any mutual agreement or understanding, expressed or implied whereby his becoming or continuing a member of such club would be of any pecuniary benefit to him whatever, direct or indirect; who has never been employed in any occupation involving the use of the oar or paddle, who rows for pleasure or recreation only, and during his leisure hours, and who does not abandon or neglect his usual business or occupation for the purpose of training for more than two weeks during a rowing season, and who has never pawned or sold any medal or trophy won by him in aquatic or athletic contest, and who has never entered in any such contest under a name other than his own.

Perhaps the first part of the definition is better Canadian than English idiom. But the meaning and intent thereof is perfectly clear. At all events, the definition hits at the athletic system which is prevalent in the States and throttles it in Canada. Now in this country we have the quaint exclusion of any man "who is or has been by trade or employment for wages a mechanic, artisan, or labourer, or engaged in any menial employment." My gamekeeper or coachman is an amateur oar, my chauffeur, whom I select because he is a mechanic, is not an amateur. The former may row at Henley regatta, the last-named may not. And yet the former, rather than the latter, are more likely to be of the class that may make trouble in the amateur sense, but they do not. The Canadians cannot accept this definition. In colonial life a man has to do all these wicked things—he has to work as a labourer and perform menial duties. Australia desires the rule amended. It is utterly unsuited to colonial life. But no, our bigwigs on the A.R.A., who are for ever preaching Imperial union and the necessity for drawing together the colonies and the mother country, will not even give them a rowing preference. They go on the public platform and denounce Radicals as Little Englanders. A man like R. C. Lehmann, M.P., gets a fair share of such vitriol, and yet he favours the amendment, and he finds no followers. Really it makes one laugh when one listens to the way these folk talk and then considers how they practice. In the interest of Imperial rowing the mechanic definition must go by the board. In these days of motors and aeroplanes it is out of place. The mechanic, the skilled mechanic, is a better educated man than many a poll man at either Oxford or Cambridge.

* * * * * *

The O.U.B.C. is affected with the modern reform plague. Whether or not this is due to the Chancellorship of Lord Curzon it would be impertinent to inquire. And yet just as he admires everything German, and while admiring trembles with fear and argues that as the foreigner does it even so must we or we are written down fools, not otherwise does the president of the Boat Club regard Cambridge. He is, it would appear, all of a tremble about the naval superiority of the Light Blues. In Mr. Harcourt Gold he has his Fisher or Tug Wilson. He has a river that puts the Cam to shame. But he is not happy. He has a majority of victories to his credit. He has a system that gives men in all colleges a chance of a Blue. But he is not happy. At Cambridge only the senior boats in the May races row in light ships. At Oxford it is otherwise. At Cambridge the other men have to row in clinker boats. Wherefore he argues such victories as Cambridge win are due to this rule as to clinker boats. If we at Oxford have the rule as to clinkers Cambridge will never win at all. These be the reasons presented to me by a correspondent. What basis they have in fact I know not. Surely well may be left alone. It is only Cambridge's fault that now and then her oarsmen win. They are invariably bad crews, so say the experts, and the losing Oxford crew invariably shows the better style and is laying the foundations of better oarsmanship. The only time Cambridge shows any signs of rowing intelligence is when it is beaten. There is thus some hope of its becoming of real value in the rowing world. But this hope is blasted by victory, which, in the case of Oxford is the guerdon of success and the reward of two or three years' honest endeavours to eradicate any rowing heresies that may be for the time being prevalent. Why, then, interfere? Why copy the foreigner? There is no reason to be fearful about the naval superiority of Cambridge even though Lord Curzon is Chancellor of Oxford. The successes of Cambridge are the accidents of incompetence. The defeats of Oxford are the fortuitous triumph of inferiority over latent superiority. Year after year the rowing specialists preach these doctrines in the Press. Who shall gainsay them? Why, then, interfere with anything that produces such a glorious psychological condition—the knowledge of superiority in defeat and the satisfaction of supremacy in success? Verily, these Reformers know not the good things the gods have given them.

* * * * * *

Goodness only knows why Oxford weakened their card with a match with the Marlborough Nomads before Christmas, when every game is of importance if a good team is to be built up for Queen's Club. Not that there seems to be any doubt about the result of the Rugby match this year. But Oxford simply overwhelmed the Nomads, who are not by any stretch of the imagination a first-class Rugby Club. Rosslyn Park would have given them a far better game. Cambridge simply tumbled to pieces against the Harlequins. The forwards failed to last, and the necessity of going for the man with the ball is a lesson that has yet to be learned. The United Services had another hard fight, and just managed to keep their end up and beat Northampton, for whom Mobbs was really brilliant. Some of the Service forwards were inclined to tackle a bit high instead of going low in the proper style. Blackheath and Scottish had a strenuous forward game that resulted in a fluky win for the Heathens. Many thought that the winning try was a touch down to the Scottish. I see there were grievous complaints that the referee never had the whistle out of mouth. Well, some referees do spoil the game by over-blowing. They are probably gentlemen with a better knowledge of the rules, and display their knowledge by making the game impossible. The spirit of the game is better than the rule. Perhaps he desired to cheer the Scottish with a sort of bagpipes solo. The O.M.T.'s forwards gave a fine display of footwork against the London Welsh, and were unlucky not to do better than draw the match.

HAIL, CALEDONIA!

(I doubt if Scotland has given the world anything greater than the game of golf.—Marquis of Linlithgow.)

When Caledonia, stern and wild,
Rose from the azure sea,
One gift from heaven she beguiled
For her posterity—
One gift all other gifts above,
To win the world's absorbing love.

'Twas not her mountains and her glens,
Her rushing brooks and streams;
'Twas not her deep, romantic dens,
Where lonely Nature dreams;
'Twas not her grandeur, dark and stern,
Her gowan, heather, and her fern;

'Twas not the courage that inspired
Her Bruce and bold Wallace,
Whose deeds unceasingly have fired
Their still unconquered race;
Nor was it the great gift of song,
Which welled profuse from Burns's tongue.

Ah, no; the gift was nobler far,
More splendid, more sublime;
'Tis found wherever Scotsmen are—
That is, in every clime:
'Tis Scotland's greatest gift to man—
Golf! Best of games since time began!

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

OLYMPIAN ANTICIPATIONS.

ANOTHER Olympia show opens on Friday, and a thoroughly interesting display may be looked for. These annual exhibitions are so firmly established now that it is almost forgotten that there was at one time talk of abandoning them. Happily the suggestion was rejected, and the notion of a November without its motor show is nowadays unthinkable. In France events took a different course. There they spent so much on externals, in electric light, gorgeous decorations, and the rest, that the trade declined eventually to meet the heavy annual deficit which resulted, and last year the Salon exhibition was not held. It was declared that there was not room for two shows, and tentative overtures were made to the British makers with a view to having an exhibition in London and Paris alternately. That proposal was, however, rejected, and this year a Salon exhibition is being held once more. Certainly Olympia need wish the Salon nothing but success.

In its general aspects this year's show may be expected to present just the same features as on former occasions. Needless to say, every inch of space has long since been bespoken. Indeed, a building twice as large as Olympia could be comfortably filled if the Society of Motor Manufacturers had it at their command. As it is Olympia just serves, and that is about all. But, even so, it is more often than not inconveniently crowded, and an attempt is being made this year to meet this particular difficulty by inaugurating a special five-shilling day in addition to the usual half-crown R.A.C. day. It is certainly a move in the right direction. The imposition of an even higher charge has been suggested, but it will be time enough to think of this when it has been noted how the five-shilling gate has worked. Meanwhile, another way in which the overcrowding of the exhibition might be sensibly mitigated would be by limiting the number of complimentary tickets issued.

Another source of complaint at Olympia is the unnecessary noise caused by the sounding of horns, sirens, and other instruments of torture. Last year the authorities made a valiant attempt to improve matters by forbidding the sounding of horns entirely, though the usefulness of the regulation would have been more apparent if it had not been so frequently disregarded. This time it is to be hoped that the rule will be not merely proclaimed but also enforced. It would be a great advantage, also, if something could be done to mitigate the crowding in the gallery in the evenings. At certain times last year it was a matter of absolute impossibility to get at some of the exhibits. Needless to say, most of those who contributed to this condition of affairs had not come to buy tyres or sparking-plugs, but merely to "see the wheels go round" and generally amuse themselves. Exhibitors must certainly lose in consequence, for the accessory section is, to the average visitor, quite the most useful and attractive portion of the show. Most motorists do not visit Olympia with the intention of buying a six-cylinder Napier or a 40-h.p. Mercédès. One and all, however, are interested in new accessories and minor aids to comfort, and ready to invest in anything in this way that takes their fancy.

With reference to mechanical developments nothing very startling is apparently to be looked for this year. On the existing lines of the petrol car, indeed, there really seems hardly room for any improvement of a sensational nature. Still, there will be plenty to interest in a minor way. Such details as more perfect lubrication, greater accessibility, and like refinements are those which chiefly engage the attention of the designers nowadays. The increase in popularity of worm drive is one feature which may be looked for. Sliding valves are extending in favour, too, and we shall this year see Panhards and Mercédès, as well as Minervas and Rovers, all equipped with that "silent Knight" type of valve which, despite its name, has yet succeeded in making such a prodigious amount of noise in the motoring world during the past few years.

Apropos of the slide v. poppet valve issue, I have received a somewhat curious communication from Messrs. Godden, Son, and Holme, solicitors, of 34, Old Jewry, E.C. It is headed "Confidential," but is presumably intended for publication none the less. The gist of the letter is that it has been written "at the instance of certain leading motor manufacturers representing a capital collectively of over £250,000" to protest against a certain recent article by a well-known motoring writer headed "Triumph of the Sleeve Valve Motor." The use of the word "triumph" in this connection, it is suggested, is calculated to mislead the public, and the letter encloses a counterblast on behalf of the poppet valve, setting forth that it holds all the existing R.A.C. records for speed, fuel economy, acceleration, hill-climbing, and so on. It is added, also, that whereas one system is employed wholly or partially by six manufacturers, the other is employed by more than one hundred. Why the elaborate apparatus of a solicitor's letter and an anonymous manifesto should be resorted to for the purpose of replying to a harmless article it is difficult to understand.

Strokes may be expected to show an increase, in pursuance of a tendency which has been general of late years, and which naturally has been further stimulated by the new system of taxing adopted based on the R.A.C. formula. Thermo syphon cooling seems also to be gaining ground. In the matter of power nothing has been more noticeable during recent years than the tendency in the direction of more moderate-sized cars. To-day the big cars are still being made, but the majority of owners have long since come to realise their drawbacks. Hence, therefore, during the last year or so makers who had previously confined their attention mainly to big stuff, have been tumbling over one another to supply the needs of those less ambitiously inclined; and this year's exhibition bids to show the process pushed still further.

On these and other points, however, I shall have an opportunity of writing more fully next week in the TRUTH Special Motor Supplement which is being issued, as usual, in connection with the exhibition.

A word as to the best means of doing the show. The wise man is he who makes up his mind as to what he wants to see beforehand, and goes for these things alone. To go to the exhibition without any preconceived plan, and to wander around aimlessly, is fatal. Instead, let the intelligent one procure a motor paper beforehand giving particulars of the exhibits, and tick off those which he would like to inspect. Then, on arrival at Olympia, let him mark all these exhibits with a blue pencil on the plan in the exhibition catalogue, and, with his course thus marked out, proceed to dispose of them all in consecutive order. But this, if you like, is a counsel of perfection. Who would dream of doing Olympia in such a methodical fashion? But it is a very good way all the same.

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR MRS. P.—Thank you for the cutting from the Blottingham Herald with the portrait of Prince Francis of Teck. It was in most of the London papers, you know, and is, I think, the best of an unflattering collection to add to your gallery of born, married, and deceased Royalties. Prince Francis held an almost unique position as a bachelor, even before he became chairman of the Middlesex Hospital, and especially stirred the imaginations of a bevy of young American belles, several of whom have been recently married. The Prince once went for a week-end to a country house at Forest Row, where he spent Saturday afternoon dispersing some eight dozen golf balls among the rhododendron bushes on the lawn. Two small children of the house, whose experience of princes was confined chiefly to Grimm and Andersen, and who were to make an official appearance after tea, were discovered in one of the said rhododendron bushes peeping at Prince Francis, who was wearing an ordinary Homburg hat. Quite unabashed at being discovered, the younger of the two, a very small girl, said, in a piping voice of disgust: "But why haven't you got your crown on?"

Please tell my father-in-law that the Florence Nightingale Memorial meeting at Grosvenor House made me understand the value he sets upon the civic element in life. Here you had a ducal mansion, a gilded chamber, aristocratic patronage; for chairman the most able country-go-to-the-dogger of the century; for audience rows and rows of beautifully powdered "idle rich" clad in the season's velvet upon which cane-bottomed chairs testified to their enthusiasm. To the superficial observers a Happy Family of G-droppers, a Mutual Admiration Society gathered together from amid the giddy whirl of pleasure to do honour to—er—to Florence Nightingale, who really received very handsome praise from Captain Sykes, Mrs. Josceline Bagot, and others. But with his usual genius for popularity Lord Charles Beresford had seen to it that not only England, home, and beauty should be represented, but also the backbone of the nation in the persons of Sir William Treloar and Sir Joseph Dimsdale—the latter half of which backbone, as it transpired later, was ready to support the brave old sea-dog through thick and thin. In the ordinary way the motion would have been carried with polite and well-controlled enthusiasm. But this was not an ordinary occasion, and to see two worthy aldermen grow righteously hot over each other's tendency to dictate was a model to the foreigner of civic independence and constitutional individualism. For the moment even Miss Nightingale herself was put in the shade. As Sir Joseph Dimsdale was entirely in agreement with Lord Charles Beresford, to the confusion of Sir William Treloar, and as all three stalwarts proposed each other to be members of a Nightingale Committee with remarks about "my old friend," I should not be in the least surprised if the meeting served the double purpose of giving Miss Nightingale the memorial she would most have appreciated—peace and quietness—and of transferring her more blatant honours to two worthy aldermen, who might otherwise have escaped the notice of posterity.

If Caroline feels she must "rub up" her French, there are always plenty of French lectures about this time of year. The foreign element in Park Lane can always be relied upon for a ballroom, gilt chairs and a protegee, with a Parisian accent, who, in the certainty of being misunderstood, is able to recommend to the English jeune fille more dashing French novels than "L'Abbé Constantin." As it happens, Mme. Marcelle Tinayre is now in England and about to lecture on "The Parisian," which seems safe enough. Caroline will remember that I sent her "La Maison du Péché" when James and I were first engaged, and that she sent it back because there was no vocabulary at the end. This was Mme. Tinayre's first success after many difficulties. She followed it with "La Vie Amoureuse de François Barbazanges," and has recently written a book on the Turkish woman. Mme. Tinayre has a good many connections in England, chiefly through her Positivist leanings, which also brought her in contact with some of the Young Turk party, formerly exiled in Paris. She was intimate with and much admired by the late Mlle. Souvestre, whose memory is perpetuated by a workman's home in Paris. For some reason or other Mme. Tinayre refused the Legion of Honour not long ago. She has a mania for light, and when dressing to go out has a roomful of candles to illuminate the occasion.

At the London Bulldog Society's Show at the Horticultural Hall Mr. Pegg's "Woodcote Tony Lumpkin," bred by Miss Wishaw, was quite the ugliest bulldog I have ever seen, which accounts, no doubt, for his succès fou. It accounts also for the large proportion of women breeders to whom the bulldog, in common with the Golliwog and the Billiken, acts as consistent Beast to fluctuating Beauty. To see two hundred and four bulldogs all in a row, however, is a melancholy sight. The enjoyments which made the bulldog's ugliness worth while are no longer legitimate; deprived of his bull, he may not even enjoy a first "grip" say of a tramp or a postman. As a matter of fact I do know of one postman in Chelsea who earns a handsome income in the shape of compensation for allowing a gentle and docile bulldog an occasional opportunity to exercise his function upon a State uniform, but most bulldogs are much less fortunately situated. To be advertised as "particularly safe with children" is discomposing when you have prided yourself on being a "bit of a dawg," nor is it compensated for in the provision of thrills for emotional ladies by an elaborately cultivated ugliness. If a piquant contrast be really so essential, face massage, electrolysis, chin-straps and higher thought should induce sufficient Beauty to necessitate rather less Beast.—Always your loving

CRIMINAL CARELESSNESS.

"Evil is wrought by want of thought" said a not very profound poet, "as well as want of heart." No other explanation is possible for some of the practices which are common to all classes in the matter of spreading disease. Women, I fancy, are the prime offenders; but this, let me hasten to add, not because men are not quite as careless, but because women, as a rule, have more to do with sickness than men. I was much interested in reading the other day an article in National Health, the organ of the "Women's Imperial Health Association," on the carelessness of the working man who travels in public vehicles clad in dirty garments in which perhaps he has just emerged from a sewer or some other insanitary place. This reminds me of the women of a higher class who sit in omnibuses on wet days clad in mackintoshes which protect the wearer at the expense of liberally bedewing her neighbours. In this way many an influenza cold has been disseminated, particularly in warm weather, when the atmosphere rapidly becomes a conglomerate of heat, moisture, and rubber, with the

The Verdict

The verdict of the doctors at the recent medical conference was that pure lactic acid cultures properly taken are of immense benefit to health. St. Ivel Cheese (Lactic) contains these cultures (the Bacillus Bulgaricus) in their best and most active form. The daily consumption of St. Ivel Cheese keeps the system in splendid condition by eliminating the poisons that other foods create.

most unhealthy result. And, by-the-way, why is it that the tiny and unobtrusive notice that "mackintoshes must be removed before entering this vehicle" is usually to be found coyly lurking in the inmost recesses of the omnibus, and can only be distinguished from the surrounding advertisements by people who know it is there and look for it, or else by people who have been studying those advertisements out of sheer boredom during the length of a long drive, and if they got in wet are quite dry by the time they discover the admonition?

The article in question makes the sensible suggestion of a smock or blouse like those worn by French workmen. But the more Radical the British working man is in his opinions, the more Conservative he grows in his habits.

Thinking upon the sins of all classes in omnibuses as opposed to those of the working men, I turned the sheet and came upon an article on the spread of disease through railway companies, in which various flagrant cases were cited of people taking children or adults suffering from infectious maladies by train. The class of the offenders was not mentioned, but it probably was good in some cases at least. Chicken-pox and measles are sometimes fellow-passengers with the unsuspecting, and so occasionally are scarlet fever and scarlatina. One mother boasted of her thoughtfulness for the public by saying that when travelling with her small daughter who had recently had measles, and was still infectious, she warned any one accompanied by children not to enter the carriage. It never occurred to her that grown-up persons might have no yearning to spend some weeks having measles themselves, and that even if the old theory that one could have them but once were not long ago exploded, one could not be sure that every one had had them in their childhood.

Not long ago visitors calling on a lady of position were told, after they had been in the house for half an hour of more, that she was feeling very tired, as she had been nursing her entire household through virulent influenza, and thought she was going to have it herself. "I hope you don't mind the infection," she added.

A honeymoon couple abroad this year had to give up many gaieties because the bridegroom developed German measles. The doctor said he was well enough to travel, but that he was infectious. However, the couple in question thought they would be more comfortable at home, so off they started, travelling without any precautions, and on the boat the bridegroom, tired of sitting still, walked about among his fellow-passengers. This was a particularly flagrant case, because they were both alive to the fact that they might possibly be responsible for the spread of the disease. Such actions are amazing in people who by birth and education one might suppose to have imbibed not only kindliness but intelligence. The phrase "criminal carelessness" needs impressing on people's minds. They are apt to forget that they may be much more seriously inconvenienced by taking out a still infectious child than by staying at home till quarantine is fully expired. Children get very tired of a long convalescence, and frequently tease to be taken out, or even to go to a party—naturally enough. It is hard to refuse them, but if people remembered that to yield is to commit an offence at common law, they might be more careful.

Notices forbidding the uneducated to spit in public vehicles are frequent; in fact, the poor are, as it were, made hygienic at the point of the sword. If they keep their rooms dirty the law gives them a prick. But among other classes there is no way of preventing women from trailing long dresses through the muddy streets; no way, that is, but an incidental change of fashion which has stopped this abomination recently among well-dressed women, but cannot be relied on to last. There is no way of preventing the well-to-do from bringing their children home in public railways from schools where an epidemic has broken out. I sometimes think health visitors are quite as much needed among the middle classes as among the poor. Here is a task for some enterprising society. We are all much interested at the moment in the welfare of the race, but we in too many cases behave as though there were never going to be any more babies in any class but the poorest.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Paris.

Friday.—A restless lot, these Parisians; I was awakened at eight o'clock and nobly served with chocolat and croissants, and ignobly with a peremptory message that I was to get up promptly, for the automobile would be ready at ten o'clock to take us to the Bois.

Here we walked down the Allée des Acacias in the joyous sunshine, and met many old friends, all dispensing invitations to afternoon tea. It seems we have come upon a land where it is always afternoon—tea.

Mme. M., who now dwells here permanently in single blessedness with a discarded spouse hiding a diminished head in Africa—the world of lost husbands—greeted me with: "I suppose you want to know all about the latest fashions?" I confessed I should like to hear of some new conceits in complexions; the painted and glazed scarlet mouth of sinful ugliness excites my wrath.

The very latest novelty, she assured me, was the artificial eyelash; no Parisian is complete without several of it, and every hairdresser will supply you with these while you wait.

I decided not to wait, and after a few sentimental reminiscences and many mutual and fictitious assurances of our unchanged charms, we parted, for Diana had conceived a desire to interview Poiret, the exclusive genius led by enthusiasm into the path of commercial creation. We had difficulty in securing his attention, and we watched his draped and undraped mannequins perambulate in a succession of his latest achievements, which mostly revealed unusual and delicious combinations of bright colour. The evening garments were definitely classic, and many of his brocaded stuffs had an ancient air, well imbued with a becoming modernity.

I could have stayed there for hours, but Diana greedily thought of lunch, and lunch we had at Pruniers', where our serving cavaliers joined us with an improved volubility in the native language still beset by indifferent accents. We came across the T——'s, who were passing through Paris on their way from Italy—madly interested in aviation, off to see the latest novelty in aeroplanes, and proudly convinced of the lofty heroism of their immediate outlook.

Pruniers' cooked lobster remains what it was, hard to beat, and good to eat—which is poetry—but Diana perversely patronised the devilled oysters.

The grand chic of costume in the room was la simplicité, and every woman had on cloth or serge cut in the plainest fashion and worn with a fur boa or knitted woollen cravat and satin cap. A definite novelty is a scoop-up in the front of the skirt with no reticence permitted for feet and ankles. A capital coat and a skirt thus treated were of blue serge with a very broad band of black braid on the hem; the coat was double-breasted with a bind of black satin beyond the braid, and revealed a waistcoat of white knitted wool; and this was crowned with a black marabout dome hedged round with white whiskers.

Mrs. T. came down from the clouds and joined us, while the men went to play baccarat in some exclusive cercle, and Diana utterly scorned my suggestion of repose for an hour and dragged us all off to the Rue de la Paix to investigate hats. I quited "plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose," but received no applause. Most of the styles are very like those I have met in London, only not so attractive, bearing soft tapestry crowns and wide fur brims of Cossack tendency, while one or two having monstrous burdens of prodigious feathers pleurant and black velvet quills outlined with fur might be well written down as foolish novelties. A high-crowned black satin hat, which could have been imported from London, bore two lancers with a small spray of white kid flowers at their base, and a wide, low-crowned cloche, showing a mole-coloured satin brim, boasted a green and blue and red tapestry ribbon bordered with sable with an upstanding peacock's feather at the back.

After the excitement of examining these I again pathetically pleaded for half an hour's rest, but my still obdurate pioneeress urged me to Rumpelmayer's, where I observed the absence of the velvet costume of our English delight. Very elaborate were the confections, but satin, or tapestry brocade, soft and thick, went to the making of most of them. Hats were bravely plumed, muffs were prodigious, and silver lace and barbaric embroideries were used with effect and much discretion. A lovely costume in indigo blue panne was completed with a Napoleon hat trimmed with an oxidised device, and a red-currant satin dress was worn with a small loose coat to match and a cap of satin bordered with skunk. An imitation chrysanthemum mounted with a spray of maidenhair adorned many a corsage. Two social teas we attended after this, and neither of them temperance. Diana is so gregarious. Another such victory and I was undone in déshabille for fifteen minutes' rest. We dined at Voisin's, where the Marquis discoursed on a certain Chambertin, which, to please him, I sampled, and then fell to meditation on the disadvantages of blue ribbons perpetually worn.

This evening to the Opéra, to welcome Mme. Nordica in "Tristan und Isolde." She is having a conspicuous triumph. I was allowed to reminisce over a meeting which she and I enjoyed at Liza Lehmann's, including some tender recollections of her charms and those of a wonderful parure of diamond trellis work which graced the corsage of her black dress. We supped at the Abbaye de Thélème—exceedingly well—but my appetite for food and gaiety was becoming exhausted. I shall have to announce, even as that famous other, "Me and my sister don't attend suppers."

Saturday.—Diana's friend the Marquis is a past master in the art of "bien manger," and we lunched at Armenonvilles'. I had a great success with a Mons. B. for allowing him to air his execrable English and describe indescribably the gowns in Les Marionettes at the Comédie Française. Mme. Pierat had a gorgeous gold gauze elaborately jewelled. Mlle. Robinne's green embroidered in jet and pearls and gold must be worth seeing worn with a turban of green with a gold feather, and I gathered that Mlle. Provost looked attractive, draped in cerise velvet and that Italian lace bordered with skunk was mounted over pink brocade to grace well Mlle. Jane Faber.

The foreign invasion was still in evidence, owing, doubtless, to the beauty of the weather; but why will the English and American feminine contingent insist upon wearing their smartest clothes at lunch? They looked like the guests at a bourgeois wedding who have come to make the traditional tour du Bois. We applauded the women in dark tailor-made costumes du matin, soft pailuchon hats or tricornes, and derided those others who sported feathers a yard long of every shade and hue, and very short velvet frocks. I resent the theory that Parisians know more about dress than others, but they have a sense of the fitness of things—I felt it keenly at Worth's earlier in the day. He is a very clever man, and proved it by introducing a touch of black into a china-blue velvet gown he is making for Diana, and by showing much discrimination in his use of embroidery He makes it his servant, and is not its slave; and I commend his notion of cloth-lined hems to induce all diaphanous gowns to be faithful to the feet.

I got back to the Ritz in time to greet the manicurist and a visiting "jewelless," thoughtfully forwarded by Mme. M and bravely resisting the temptation of going to sleep for an hour, I fell a victim to an enamel pendant of quaint Venetian design set with rough jewels, and holding a roc pearl at the base.

After dinner we went to hear "La Vierge Folle," a dramatic delight of Henri Batailles', which is to have its English translation produced in New York with Miss Constance Collier as the wife who is perpetually usurping the métier of le bon Dieu—forgiveness.

There were some good frocks in the house. Most of the dresses were cut low, but moderately. A blonde of elegance wore a gown of rose pink silk muslin embroidered h vily in silver. There were cashmere and Paisley designs, suggesting the Court of Napoleon I., and many of the frocks had detachable trains held with ornaments of pearl, or steel, or jet. The hairdressing was distinctly Empire, little curls falling right over to hide the ears; the tinsel turban was much in evidence, and some new tiaras of pale yellow tortoiseshell tipped with diamonds, rubies, or emeralds, while a pendant cameo or miniature slung over the shoulders by a black velvet ribbon was ubiquitous. The best of the cloaks were of beaded silk muslin glittering with gold, silver, or steel, and trimmed with fur; others, more seasonable, were of velvet, a few were made of tapestry worked with gold, and a tailless ermine cloak widely bordered with musquash merited instant transportation.

I wanted to sup at Maxine's, but was informed that nowadays it was there I was to dine, and I was taken to the Café de Paris to eat greedily and drink—this is growing serious—some Muscat; I indulged in undistinguished fluencies for some thirty minutes and heard faintly news of Max Dearly, Fotit, Otero, and Lenthelme. And so to bed, and how gladly!

Sunday.—We uprose early according to indigenous custom, and, having chartered an extra automobile, divided into the obvious pairs; when I at once wished for Diana's companion. The accepted fact that I am attracted by A. always makes me rebelliously determined to prove I would sooner be with B. Howsomever, we motored peacefully to Rolleboise, forty-five miles from Paris on the road to Rouen and Havre, passing through St. Germain's and Mantes, whose cathedral served as the model for Notre Dame.

Rolleboise is on the Seine, and our destination was the house of Herbert Ward, the cleverest of the younger sculptors and fully equipped with gold medals from the Salon. The Luxembourg has bought one of his Congo groups, and this week there appears in England and France his book "A Voice from the Congo." I was most keen to meet him, for he is the only survivor of the officers who served under Stanley in the Emin Pasha expedition. His house is large and fine, looking down on a wealth of roses and greenery, honeysuckles and other sweet smelling blossoms lovingly tended round the balconies, verandahs, and windows by Mrs. Ward, who has an absorbing passion for gardening, amiably indulged by the soil and climate. I enjoyed myself immensely, and the thought of going to the races seemed absurd in the midst of such abiding interest; the sky was too blue, the river too beautiful, the flowers too fragrant, the freshly picked strawberries too luscious. So we remained, wisely preferring the flowers to the frocks, the slow winding river to the faster horses, the Ward to the wardrobe, as Diana flippantly suggested.

Later I went to the studio in the Boulevard Berthier, looking on to the fortifications. Its walls are thick-set with spears, statuary of various African types abound, trophies from the Congo are on all sides, and a huge elephant's head added a weird charm and the sense of tropical mystery deepened in the half evening light.

On our way back we met some of the revellers from Longchamp, and I marked bronze green as a prevailing incident in costume, and discovered the most captious could well be satisfied with this worn with dull silver ornaments and the new upstanding skunk-edged collar band. I saw two pleasing wraps, one of moleskin collared with seal, and the other of squirrel decked with skunk, and all the worthy hats were soft caps, fur or metallic lace edged.

To-morrow we go to town, and the proper reward of a well-spent week will be the dreary waiting for the arrival of Diana's gowns and hats and some self-congratulation on my own abstention from anything more serious than chocolates and pendants, and a deep measure of consolation in the thought that in London I can reach the highest ideals of dress at less expenditure and fatigue and inconvenience. Vive London! And I fear I shall need another rest cure at Brighton.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Jean.—Have the hat of satin lined with velvet, and the flowers of dark satin with a pale pink calyx. The Parisian Hat Company, 67, Knightsbridge, will make this for 30s.

Mongrel.—I think the grey and blue scheme would be dull and ineffective. Peacock blue and purple are an adorable combination—try that; or, as an alternative, I suggest Oriental green (rather blue in tone this is, but bright) over a gold coloured satin, and hem the tunic with skunk, and belt it with gold set with green stones. Transparent ivory lace should extend from the waist to the throat, and the tunic being of ninon or chiffon should at the top be cut in one with the sleeves. I forgive you the length of your letter on this occasion only; make the next shorter.

Meyk.—Debenham and Freebody's, Wigmore Street, have those ninon blouses overrun with white porcelain beads; and I like them immensely, especially in dark blue.

A Very Unwise One.—I have only space for one answer. And you ask so many questions, and I am much flattered. Venetian blue cachemire de soie costume, tactfully garnished on bodice with dull gold, and a long fur-collared coat to match. More next week.

TO AN AMATEUR ACTRESS.

I have your dainty note to say
You're getting up a little play,
And adding, in your charming way,
It would attract
If I on such and such a day
Would come and act.

I take it, you would have me be
A super-man; and I agree
A part like that need certainly
Not be rehearsed,
But, for all that, I think I'll see
You further first.

I gather that the hero's cue
Is to make red-hot love to you;
Jack always gets these jobs to do,
My sly old coz.;
I don't know why, but it is true
He always does.

Still, I will come—not, not to shine
In any dry dramatic line;
Motley's the wear for which I pine
Most, as a rule,
Fair cousin, it shall just be mine
To play the fool.

A LETTER FROM LIVERPOOL.

DEAR TRUTH,—Farewells are in the air around us in these late October days. The City's hosts and hostesses of the year are making way for new mayoral folk. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress were entertained to a house dinner by the Reform Club in token of farewell to them in office. Although politicians of every shade of colour were there, politics were taboo, and brief and pleasant speeches were made by the Lord Mayor, Mr. Charles Booth, the chairman (Sir Archibald Williamson), and Mr. A. E. Jacob. Mrs. Charles Booth wore a black gown arranged with aluminium and silver, and Mrs. W. H. Williams, the Lady Mayoress, was in golden brown chiffon veiling yellow satin. Lady Bowring wore a tiara with her lace dress, Lady Johnson was in filmy black, and Lady Russell wore black satin, the sombre setting showing her fine head to advantage. Mr. and Mrs. Carruthers, Mayor and Mayoress of Bootle, and Mr. and Mrs. Arkle, Mayor and Mayoress of Birkenhead, have made their good-byes. Mrs. Carruthers gave a charming ball; Mrs. Arkle held two receptions, at which great balconies of chrysanthemums amid delicate greenery adorned the pretty Town Hall, and the hostess looked exceedingly pretty in white satin veiled in black net and beautiful old lace.

A branch of the Children's Happy Evenings Associations has now been established among us. The Countess of Derby came from Paris to attend the inaugural meeting, at which the Lady Mayoress presided, and Mrs. Bland Sutton spoke so well and so ably that hosts of sympathisers were gained.

The great occasion of the week was the presentation of the portraits of the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, who resign on the 9th. We shall miss them greatly, Mrs. W. H. Williams, by her beauty, her charm, and her sympathy with the poor having made friends and admirers in all classes of the town.—Ever yours,

WINIFRED.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

A very great change has come over English furniture. It is doubtful whether it will ever get back to the glories of Sheraton and Chippendale now that the conditions of workmanship are all so different, but there is something very admirable about a great deal of modern furniture. On the one hand we have delightful copies of the masterpieces of other days adapted to the size and shape of modern rooms and to modern ideas of house arrangements. For instance, sideboards were usually made massive by the necessity for a cellaret, but now bottles are rarely kept in a dining-room. On the other hand, we have frankly modern stuff, well made, light in outline, and even light in colour; for the introduction of fumed oak for inexpensive furniture only ran parallel with an increasing idea that there was no necessity for furniture to be made of sombre woods. Ever since "the spacious days of great Elizabeth" we have been getting less spacious, and yet it was some time before furniture began to adapt itself to changed conditions.

In the suburbs one may still see the "suitable" dining-room of what Miss Austen would have called "respectable families." It is invariably papered in dark red, has portraits in dull gilt frames, or else photogravures of heavy pictures. Massive furniture of walnut or mahogany stands rigidly about on a Turkey carpet, and enormous leather chairs at either side of the fireplace add a last touch of solidity to the general effect. From this idea of suitable surroundings in which to eat (and surely nothing but joints and tarts are appropriate to such a room) we are daily becoming emancipated, and I hear on good authority that it is no longer considered flighty, even in Peckham, not to have the chairs ranged against the wall. This is a great relief to those frivolous persons who object to having their dining-rooms arranged as if for a ghostly confirmation class.

Old furniture has inspired many books during the last few years, and the craze for it has been largely fostered by American visitors to this country. It it is quite possible to furnish at moderate prices with old things if one knows where to go to get them. I am not surprised that the lady furnisher has appeared on the horizon during the last few years. A number of people seem constitutionally unable to understand how to furnish in accordance with surroundings. I know of an exquisite old house in Cambridgeshire whose hall is large, low, square, red-tiled, white-walled, black-beamed; it is furnished with a large round mahogany table, a bamboo umbrella stand, and a square of Kidderminster carpet. A magnificent old castle in England has some of the bedrooms done up in Louis Quinze white and gold. Anything more absurd within these massive walls could scarcely be imagined. They are like ice cream in the heart of a joint. I believe the Duchess of Roxburghe had a Frenchman over to redecorate and refurnish Floors Castle in the French style not long ago.

It is a good thing that in nearly every old furniture shop of repute in London one finds expert knowledge to guide one through such pitfalls as these, though the real stumbling block is, of course, always personal taste. In Mr. E. F. Benson's new book, for instance, "The Osbornes," the kindly old wife of the new millionaire who has made his money in hardware makes several striking changes in the historic mansion they have rented, puts two large mahogany hat stands in the old oak hall and an enormous early Victorian mahogany sideboard at one side. There is a stuffed crocodile lizard standing up on its hind-legs and carrying aloft on its four paws a tray for cards. One remembers the story of the lady who garbed a famous Hermes in little flannel breeches for the sake of decency, and one cannot help wishing, as on so many other occasions, that the distribution of old furniture among those who love it had been more equally managed.

The Women's Agricultural and Horticultural International Union held its annual meeting last week, an occasion which bears not very indirectly on the domestic question, for their speech was "Fruit Farming for Women," which, according to various experts, can be made to pay with plenty of energy and capital. From every part of the world the word "energy" is endorsed. An English lady, who is back from Australia, where she went in for market gardening, said that she was frequently at work at four o'clock in the morning, and worked till it was dark, but as a result she was able to state that a woman farmer in Australia can make an income and lay by for the future. But while English women are thus carving out careers for themselves laboriously, it is curious to note that in other branches of service shorter hours and higher wages are the demand. The parlourmaid quoted above shows that the servant question will never improve until servants have greater liberty, higher wages, and less to do. It is a bewildering thing to compare the demands of one set of people with the wishes of another. Many a mistress of a well-organised house would not be sorry to exchange lots with one of her upper servants; but, of course, households differ and servants differ, and the difficulty of getting at the rights of any demand is the impossibility of drawing a general conclusion from any particular case.

The cold winds are with us, and the warning sneeze of influenza is heard in the land, consequently warm and light shawls, gloves, spencers, and petticoats are coming rapidly into season. An aged widow of seventy-nine living in the Shetland Isles has managed for many years to support herself and an invalid daughter by spinning and knitting real Shetland articles of any size. Her terms are moderate, and anyone who wants the exquisite fleeces, which are of feather weight and yet keep out the cold as if by magic, should send an order to Mrs. Williamson at 66, Abingdon Road, Kensington.

An admirable invention has just been put upon the market by which it is possible to match colours by artificial light. It is small enough to be carried in a handbag, and consists of two iridescent leaves. When material is placed between these two the real daylight colour is seen at once. Thus many sartorial and household tragedies will be averted in future.

Foie gras dishes are always welcome, particularly if they are properly made with something less rich than the foie gras. I have been served with sandwiches made of mingled caviare and foie gras, but this was neither in England nor in France. Foie gras and chicken is a good mixture, particularly when the two are properly mixed together, either pounded or chopped very fine, as in the following recipe:—

Aspic of Foie Gras à la Célestine.—Cut a whole foie gras into neat scallops, which trim; on each scallop place a ring or star of truffle dipped in aspic, which, when set, must be used to decorate the bottom and sides of a plain round mould. Pour cold aspic over it, keeping the mould on ice until a coating is formed. Chop the trimmings of foie gras with an equal quantity of cold white chicken, adding an ounce of butter, two spoonfuls of cold white sauce, and a little liquid aspic, season delicately, and rub it through a wire sieve. Mix the purée with half a gill of cream (whipped for preference), and set it in the centre of the mould. Pour in cold liquid aspic to fill the mould, and place it on the ice. Dish the aspic mould garnished with tiny balls of foie gras rolled in finely chopped truffle, and a border of chopped jelly.

Lemons are an essential in every household, but this year they are so dear that the economical cook is in despair. I am told that this is due to the Messina earthquake, which ruined a large part of the lemon trade. The matter is solved, however, by the use of West Indian limes, which are most delicious (many people prefer them to lemons) and are freely on the market at present. They can be used wherever lemons are necessary, and they make admirable lime squashes. Their use will be found to give quite a distinctive note to both the following dishes, but in each case the juice of the fresh fruit must be used.

Timbale de Ris de Veau en Kari.—The first essential is a good curry sauce rubbed through a hair sieve, and seasoned with cream, a pinch of chopped pimento, a teaspoonful of lime-juice, and the yolks of two eggs; into this sauce put a nicely braised sweetbread, cut into scallops, and a sliced truffle. Grease and paper a plain charlotte mould, decorate it with truffle, and line it thickly with creamy chicken quenelle. Fill the centre with the curried sweetbread, cover in with the quenelle, twist a greased paper over, and steam it for three-quarters of an hour. Serve curry sauce round. To make the quenelle:—Pound 8 ozs. of raw chicken, add 2 ozs. of butter, and 4 ozs. of stiffly reduced bread sauce, pepper and salt, and one egg with the yolk of another, pound the ingredients thoroughly together, and rub it through a wire sieve, then work in a gill of thick cream.

Fillets of Sole à la Demidoff.—Trim the fillets of a medium sized pair of soles, and spread the inside with a stuffing made thus:—First, after removing the skin and gills from a dozen white mushrooms, chop them finely, sprinkling with lime-juice, to preserve the colour, cook them in a covered stewpan with butter, pepper, salt, and lime-juice. Pound the flesh of a nice whiting, adding the white of an egg and a spoonful of cream, season, and rub it through a fine wire sieve, work the fish in a basin with a gill of thick cream, and mix in the prepared mushroom. Having stuffed the fillets, fold them over, place them in a sautepan, moisten with stock, cover them with a greased paper, and cook them in a moderate oven until the farce is firm. Make a border with mashed potato, to which add the yolk of an egg, brush with well-beaten yolk, and bake it a golden colour. Dish the fillets on the border, and sauce them with creamy white sauce that is made with the reduced liquor from the boiled bones of the fish. Put a round piece of truffle on each fillet, and garnish the centre with scallops of fish and truffles, button mushrooms, and miniature quenelles.

THE SCOTTISH FAIRY BOOK.

By ELIZABETH W. GRIERSON. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 100 Illustrations in Red and Black by MORRIS MEREDITH WILLIAMS. Small demy 8vo, cloth, 6s., post free.

This volume is a fascinating collection of stories of the Fairies, Bogies, Brownies, Witches, and Kelpies, in whom old-time Scotsmen so firmly believed. In no country were the "Little Folk" held in greater awe and respect than in Scotland in no country is there a richer store of fairy material from which an author can draw. Some of the stories are very old; so old that they seem to have passed out of memory. Others were known to our grandfathers and grandmothers; not many, probably, are familiar to the child of to-day. The illustrations, full of whimsical humour and all manner of quaint conceits, add much to the charm of an already delightful book.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the newly established weekly Journal, Mrs. Bull, under the same direction as that of John Bull, as a broad-minded and outspoken organ devoted to the interests of women.

The directors are satisfied that there is an equal opening for such a journal as there was for John Bull, and their opinion has been abundantly confirmed by the reception which has been accorded to its first number—for which the Trade orders amounted to nearly 800,000 COPIES, whilst the Advertisement income totalled considerably over £1,000, notwithstanding that a large number of orders had to be held over. It may be confidently asserted that these figures constitute a record in the case of a new publication. It has taken John Bull upwards of four years to achieve such results. It is, however, a well-established fact that two "sister publications" issued under one administration and inter-dependent upon each other invariably achieve equal measures of success, and there is every indication that this will be the case with John Bull and Mrs. Bull.

What such a Circulation and Advertisement revenue means may be gauged from the following extracts from the Publishers' Books relating to John Bull, showing the Trading Profits after charging all expenditure of an ordinary character:—

|---|---|---|---|
| July | £2,648 | 16 | 4 |
| August (Holiday Month).. | £2,046 | 0 | 3 |
| September | £3,402 | 11 | 5 |

Notwithstanding that, in some ways, the field open to Mrs. Bull, especially from an advertising point of view, is even greater than in the case of John Bull, it is quite unnecessary to enlarge upon the probable financial results of the undertaking, as the issue of Shares now being offered for subscription will require only £3,000 per annum for its service, although, as will be seen below, Subscribers will have the option of sharing in the full profits pro rata with the founders of the journal.

The Capital of the Company is £150,000. Of this amount, £100,000 consists of Ordinary Shares, but none of these are offered for subscription. The remaining £50,000 is divided into 400,000 Readers' Preference Shares of 2s. 6d. each.

These shares are now offered for subscription. They are called Preference Shares because they are entitled to a cumulative dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, before the ordinary shareholders receive anything out of the profits. It will thus be seen that the first £3,000 earned by the paper in each year—that is to say, 6 per cent. upon £50,000 (or 400,000 2s. 6d. shares)—is to go to the Preference Shareholders; and a reference to the figures given above will show that the provision of the Preference dividend is a relatively small matter. In addition, every Preference Shareholder will have the right to convert his holding into Ordinary Shares, and thus participate in the total profits. So much for the purely commercial aspect of the shares now being offered.

There is, however, another, and a very important, consideration attaching to the issue. It will be observed that the Preference Shares are called READERS' SHARES, and that they are of the popular denomination of 2s. 6d. each. The idea, quite apart from the question of investment, is, as far as possible, to make every reader of the paper a part proprietor of it—thus applying the co-operative principle which has proved so remarkably successful in the case of John Bull, and in a lesser degree of other publications.

Although the new Journal will be in all respects under the same control as that of John Bull, great pains have been taken to get together an exceptionally competent editorial staff—imbued with the same spirit of broad-minded commonsense, unfettered by convention or commonplace, as that which has characterised the pages of John Bull, and has contributed so largely to its unique success. Up till now, women have been without any Press organ of their own worthy of the name. Dress patterns, vulgar society small talk, and pudding recipes have been the standard characteristic of practically all women's journals—just as, prior to the establishment of John Bull, party claptrap and inane submission to the Powers that Be were the order of the day in the journalism of the Man in the Street.

The commercial department of the Journal will, as in the case of John Bull, be under the management of Messrs. Odhams Limited, whose facilities for newspaper printing and publishing are greater than those of any other firm in the trade, and who have furnished the following report to the Directors:—

26th October, 1910.

To the Directors, "Mrs. Bull, Limited."

Gentlemen,—In accordance with your request, we have pleasure in furnishing you with the following report:—

The new Journal, "Mrs. Bull," has been received most favourably throughout the Trade. Before the first number went to press our wholesale orders amounted to nearly 700,000 copies—one well-known house having given the largest order ever issued for a new weekly paper; whilst the total constitutes a record figure. Since the issue many repeat orders have been received—amounting to approximately another 100,000 copies—and after printing 700,000 copies we were compelled to declare the number out of print.

As regards advertisements, the facts are much the same. Every available space was booked up weeks before the paper came out—one large manufacturing firm booking a page a week, at full scale rate, until the end of 1911, with the option of renewal for a further period of years at an enhanced price. We have been compelled to omit a large number of advertisements for want of space. Orders are coming in freely for other issues, and many firms are booking spaces for a long period.

In our experience no other journal has been so well received by the Public, the Trade, and the Advertiser, and we see no reason to doubt that its success will be equal to that of "John Bull." We are, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

ODHAMS LIMITED,

Ernest Lynch Odhams, Secretary.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,651.—FURTHER ASSORTED SPECIMENS.

TOPICAL SONGS OF A HUMOROUS CHARACTER DEALING WITH SOME SUBJECT OF UP-TO-DATE INTEREST.

Why be poor in these happy times?
"Poverty is the worst of crimes,"
Every day in the Press I'm told,
Men are waiting with piles of gold,
If you are short of a pound or two
Don't delay, for it's all for you.
"Though we've worked for this pile of pelf,
Here you are, it's all for yourself!"

Refrain.

Tell that tale to the Horse Marines,
Think we're a lot of Johnny Greens.
Your words may be fine,
We beg to decline,
What's going on behind the scenes!

Solly will lend a thousand pounds,
Pay as you please (how nice it sounds!).
Skinnem knows of a rubber "deal,"
Cent. per cent. should the shares reveal.
But selfishness is a deadly sin,
Just for a pound he'll let you in,
You'll have nothing to do each day
But with bags of sovereigns play!

Refrain.

Djaffi.

When I was a boy at school
I was never thought a fool.
And I only was caned just once
For showing myself a dunce.
But my back was always sore
When I got into Form Four.

O! one and two and three
Were easy as could be,
And I wouldn't have minded five or six,
Or even a dozen more,
But my heart it failed,
And my soul it quailed,
At the beastly, dirty, horrible tricks
Of that nasty old Form Four.

I went for a soldier bold,
And, dressed in bright red and gold,
The goose-step I then was taught.
And I felt how well I'd have fought,
But I got in disgrace once more
When the sergeant called, "Form Four."

O! one and two and three, etc.

And now I have bought my home,
And no more I intend to roam,
I've a wife and children dear,
But trouble has come, I fear,
For the Government wants my gore,
And Lloyd George he calls, "Form Four."

O! one and two and three, etc.

Almaviva.

If I were a "Territorial"
I would, I would
Not order arms in fifteen ways
And forget that the right one sometimes pays,
If I were a "Territorial."

If I were a Tory paper
I would, I would
Not ourse my leader quite such a lot,
And remember we're not all going "to pot,"
If I were a Tory paper.

If I were a gentle Suffragetto
I would, I would
Just go to a certain Athenian play
And learn how the coy ones won the day,
If I were a Suffragette.

If I were a politician
I would, I would
I'd wear an eyeglass, yes, I would,
And look as bored as ever I could,
If I were a politician.

But if I were a man with any cash
I would, I would,
I'd sail away in an aeroplane
To a land of the fumblies for ever again,
I would, I would

Consilium.

"THE SONG OF THE HAPPY LANDOWNER."

I am sorry that my uncle when he died
Left his minerals and country house to me.
Like a most reluctant witness I replied
To the questions neatly scheduled 1, 2, 3.

But the bitterness of party is alLoy(e)d,
Valuation is a very simple task;
For the Chancellor is bland.
If you fail to understand,
Take a ticket up to Downing Street and ask!

Now the local blacksmith says he wants to know
What I spent and how I spent it on my place.
I am half inclined to chuck the blooming show—
Shall the man that shoes my horses set the pace?

But the bitterness of party is alLoy(e)d, etc.

That "intelligent official" seemed surprised
When I told him that I didn't keep accounts.
He was quite prepared to trust me; he surmised
"I could calculate the average amounts."

But the bitterness of party is alLoy(e)d, etc.

If I couldn't he was quite disposed to speak,
For the dairy farm "had cost a pretty site."
"Fifty cottages at two-and-six a week
As an increment," he fancied, "would be right."

But the bitterness of party is alLoy(e)d, etc.

The "assistance" that he rendered made me pause,
For the attitude of the official mind
Is to those who would interpret subtle laws
Not illuminant, though uniformly kind.

But the bitterness of party is alLoy(e)d, etc.

While "incurring no unnecessary cost,"
Can I possibly fill up that dreaded form?
Now a George for Merry England. I am lost!
I will burn the thing and face the coming storm!

But the bitterness of party is alLoy(e)d, etc.

Erina.

'APPY 'OXTON.

Accordin' to the papers, some folks is cuttin' capers,
An' some'ow seem to fancy they've got a lot to ugnt at Becos' they 'as to fill in some figgers they ain't willin'
That uvver blokes wot want 'em should ever git a sight at.
But dahn ahr court at 'Oxton we 'aven't yut bin foxed on—
They couldn't easy tap us w'en we woz on the 'oppin';
An' we're waitin' nah like Britons, as tame as tabby kittens,
To see the tax-collectors when fr'end'y like they drop in.

Chorus.

For we ain't no mingy niggers—we're used to spoiling figures—
An' other people's eyes we ain't afraid of;
So if Lloydy George is pally, 'e'll come dahn Primrose Alley,
An' see 'isself exactly wot we're made of.

We're 'earty though we're 'umble—you never ears us grumble
At uvver fossers' questions concernin' fac's and money;
To Gover'ment inspectors an' tax an' rate collectors
Ahr attitood is puffect—inwariably sunny;
An' if they come a-lookin' for figgers for their bookin',
We treats 'em at the corner an' gives 'em quite a beano
Ahr methods may be scrappy, but we're aht to make 'em 'appy—
We gives 'em wot they arsks for an' keep ahr record clean O!

We're nuffin' if not British, an' though a trifle skittish,
We never takes no credit wiv 'alf a chance of p-yin';
An' Lloydy George could trust 'is exchequer to ahr justice
If up at 'Appy 'Oxton 'e ever thought of strayin'.
'E's one of us 'is Georgie, an' we'd like to 'ave a horgy,
An' inwite 'im to be chairman at the "Crow an' Stump" to-morrer.
Like us, 'e never lingers to let things through 'is fingers,
An' when 'e's wantin' ooftish 'e knows the way to borrer.

ENTRE NOUS.

In response to the appeal published last week, I have received the contributions noted below for the Truth Toy Fund and the "Tress Barry" Fund. For the benefit of those who missed their Truth last week, I take this opportunity of mentioning that the Toy Fund requires only the trifling sum of £1,000 to provide at Christmas dolls and toys for the whole of the children in the Poor-law institutions and the hospitals of London; and that the Tress Barry Fund wants another £250 to continue the late Sir Francis Tress Barry's annual Christmas box of a new sixpence to all the elder of the Poor-law children. In regard to the Toy Fund, it is particularly desirable that the required amount should now be made up as quickly as possible. These are the receipts to date:—

I am very thankful to be able to report that various kind ladies have now taken off my hands every one of the unclothed dolls, whose condition has been worrying me during the last few weeks. A show of upwards of 4,600 dressed dolls is thus assured at the Albert Hall next month. When so many kind-hearted ladies are engaged in this work, may I point out to those readers who—whether from defective education or other causes—are unable to dress dolls, that they may still make themselves equally useful by assisting to pay for them?

The King and Queen have gone to Sandringham until Monday, the 21st, when they are to take up their residence at Windsor Castle. Their Majesties will then make Windsor the headquarters of the Court until the beginning of February, when they are to remove to Buckingham Palace for the season.

The King's first day of shooting at Sandringham was devoted to the West Newton, Appleton, and Hitcham preserves. Prince Arthur of Connaught and Lord Farquhar accompanied his Majesty. Partridges were very scarce, but a large number of hares and rabbits were killed. The King's second day was devoted to pheasant shooting in Commodore woods, and there were an immense number of birds. His Majesty devoted a considerable part of the week to the transaction of estate business, and he inspected the home farm and the breeding stud at Wolferton. Some new arrangements as to the management of the property have been decided upon, but there are to be no material changes, and everything will be carried on as nearly as possible the same as in King Edward's time.

In their account of the King's visit to Sandringham most of the papers state that several guests were entertained by his Majesty at York Cottage and joined the shooting parties. As a matter of fact Prince Arthur of Connaught was the only guest at York Cottage, besides the members of the household-in-waiting. Lord

Farquhar was staying at Castle Rising, and he drove over to Sandringham on the days when he joined the shooting parties.

A weekly journal gave out the other day that the King is going to arrange with Queen Alexandra as to the future management of the Sandringham estate, and also about the shooting. King Edward's Norfolk estates (as was mentioned in TRUTH several weeks ago) were bequeathed by him to King George, including the breeding stud at Wolferton and the stock on the home farm. Sandringham Hall is Queen Alexandra's country residence, and, of course, she has the gardens and park at her disposal, the arrangements being the same as are usual under such circumstances when a place is assigned to a widow as a dower house. I understand that the "upkeep" of gardens and park will be paid out of the estate revenue. King George is keeping on the home farm and the breeding stud at Wolferton.

Queen Alexandra arrived at Buckingham Palace on Saturday evening from Copenhagen, and she will spend the next few weeks at Sandringham. It is probable that her Majesty will go for a cruise in the Mediterranean early in the spring in the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, in which case she will most likely be accompanied by the Empress Marie, who is now at Copenhagen.

The Royal yachts Victoria and Albert and Alexandra have been laid up at Portsmouth until the middle of January, when they will be overhauled and refitted. The Royal yachts will have considerable extra service next June in connection with the conveyance of official guests for the Coronation.

A correspondent writes:—

The visit of the German Emperor and Empress to Brussels was a dreadful gêne to the Belgian Court, and it was an honour which King Albert would readily have dispensed with. The authorities were in a state of acute panic through dread of anarchists, and there was a great fear that the Emperor might be insulted by the crowd, Germans being just now very unpopular in Belgium. There has been much public indignation because King Albert arrayed himself in a German uniform when the Imperial guest arrived and departed. The Emperor must have passed a considerable time each day in changing his dress. It is said that during the three days of his visit he appeared in fifteen different uniforms.

The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Sweden left Clarence House on Saturday morning for Cologne. They are this week paying a visit to the Prince and Princess of Wied at Neuwied, on the Rhine, whence they will proceed to Stockholm. The Crown Princess Margaret is to act as First Lady of the Court of Stockholm during the winter, as the Queen of Sweden is going to Italy for several months for the benefit of her health.

The Queen Dowager of the Netherlands has returned to The Hague for the winter after a round of visits in Germany. Queen Wilhelmina and the Prince Consort are still staying at the Château of Loo, the Royal domain near Apeldoorn. It is expected that the Prince Consort of the Netherlands will come to England next June to represent the Court of The Hague at the Coronation.

The Duke and Duchess of Cumberland and Princess Olga of Hanover arrived in Denmark from Germany at the beginning of last week, and have since been the guests of King Frederick and Queen Louise at the Château of Fredensborg. On leaving Denmark the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland will pay a visit to the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin at Ludwigslust, after which they are to return to their country seat near Gmunden until the last week in December, when they are going to Vienna for two months.

There is no truth in the statement of several daily papers that the Duchess of Cumberland and Princess Olga are coming to England shortly on a visit to Queen Alexandra at Sandringham. The last visit of the Duchess of Cumberland to England took place in 1875, some years before her marriage, when she accompanied King Christian and Queen Louise on a visit to Windsor Castle, Sandringham, and Marlborough House. The Duke of Cumberland has not been in England since June, 1878, when he came over for a few days in order to attend the funeral of his father, King George of Hanover, at Windsor Castle.

The Comtesse de Paris has left Wood Norton on her way to Madrid, and she will reside during the winter and spring months at Villamanrique, her estate near Cadiz.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

Last week, at the annual opening meeting of the Trinity College Historical Society, which, departing from precedent, discussed questions of politics, Lord MacDonnell instructed us in Devolution Home Rule, producing a highly developed scheme. Lord Plunket made a graceful, non-committal speech, showing a patriotic mind widened by New Zealand experiences. Mr. Justice Ross and Captain Bryan Cooper also spoke. Lord Ashbourne did not, as he frequently does, occupy the chair as President of the Society. Lord MacDonnell has been staying for a few days at Monkstown, a short distance from Dublin, with Mr. Commissioner Finucane, an old school-fellow in the West of Ireland, who also had a career in the Indian Civil Service, on retiring from which he was appointed, during Lord MacDonnell's Under-Secretaryship, an administrator of the intricate Land Laws of Ireland.

Lord Charles Beresford gave us enlightenmeent as a naval expert at a dinner given in his honour by the Corinthian Club in Dublin. Other speakers on the occasion were the Lord Chief Justice, Lord O'Brien, and Mr. Justice Ross, the latter of whom might almost seem to have emulated Sir Boyle Roche's bird, by being in two places at once, as his speech at the Historical Society was delivered on the same night. Lord Charles Beresford was staying with Sir George and Lady Holmes at their residence just outside Dublin. Sir George Holmes is the head of the Board of Works, which has a leading place amongst the Government Departments in Ireland owing to the command it exercises over finance.

Lord Morley's years spent in Ireland were full of troubled times. Still he made many friends in the country, and was a pleasant and popular guest at the historic Christmas parties at Lord Justice FitzGibbon's villa on the Hill of Howth. Personality, however, never conquers political feeling in Ireland. Lord Morley's politics clashed with those, not only of the "Society," but also of the cultured classes, whose culture up to the present time has mainly come from Trinity College sources. Lord Morley never had a "season" at the Chief Secretary's Lodge, and lived little there during his tenure of office, preferring a picturesque villa on Killiney Hill overlooking the Bay, so celebrated for its lovely scenery and fresh sea breezes. Lord Morley has many friends in Ireland, which he privately visits occasionally.

Lord and Lady Pembroke have been visiting Ireland, staying with Captain and Lady Beatrix Wilkinson at Mount Merrion, some few miles south of Dublin. The house, of unpretentious size, is the only Pembroke residence on the estate, and has usually been inhabited by the agent or let to tenants. Lord Pembroke has lent it to his daughter, Lady Beatrix Wilkinson, since her husband's appointment as "Ulster." There are large gardens and a fine demesne, amongst the splendid trees of which the "big wind" a few years ago wrought such havoc. Lord and Lady O'Brien, with their family, are now settled at Airfield in the neighbourhood of Mount Merrion some miles nearer to Dublin.

Lord and Lady Kenmare, who spent the late summer and autumn at Killarney House, have now left it. When September and October are "good they are very good"—which they were this year—at Killarney, but in winter the fine surrounding mountains bring rain an example in scenery of "il faut souffrir pour etre beau." The present Killarney House is not the one in which Lord Kenmare entertained Queen Victoria on her first visit to Killarney, but a beautiful modern and luxurious residence, built by the late Lord Kenmare, who so long held office in Queen Victoria's household. Lord Kenmare is a director of the Guinness Company and the brother-in-law of Lord Revelstoke, another director.

Lord Dunraven has lately been paying a short visit to Adare. He naturally takes much interest in the present position of Irish affairs, but the serious and continued illness of Lady Dunraven, at Kenry House, prevents him making any long stay in Ireland. His daughter, Lady Ardee—now his only child—has just given birth to a son. Lord MacDonnell's Home Rule scheme is doubtless also Lord Dunraven's, at least in all its leading features. It is now some years ago since Irish history was in the making in South Kerry, with Lords Lansdowne and Dunraven on opposite shores of Kenmare Bay, and Lord MacDonnell picturesquely flitting across the broad waters.

A weekly contemporary states that "it is thought possible that Sir Dighton Probyn may give up his residence in the Norman Tower at Windsor Castle." Sir Dighton Probyn has already "given up" this house, which, as a matter of fact, is the official residence at Windsor of the Keeper of the Privy Purse, and it will in future be occupied by Sir William Carington. The house is given up as a matter of course directly the occupant ceases to hold the place in the household to which it is annexed. The official residence of the Keeper of the Privy Purse in London is a house in Stable Yard, St. James's Palace, which Queen Victoria quite irregularly granted to Lady Ponsonby for her life. Of course, the house ought not to have been parted from the office.

Miss Margaret Trefusis, who is engaged to be married to Captain Edgar Brassey, is the youngest daughter of the late Colonel and Lady Mary Trefusis. She is a niece of the Duke of Buccleuch and of the late Mr. Rolle, and a first cousin of Lord Clinton. Her sisters are Lady Coke, Mrs. Arthur Crichton, Mrs. William Naper, and Miss Eva Trefusis. The Misses Trefusis inherited the large fortune of their father's aunt, Lady Rolle. Colonel Trefusis was next heir to the great Rolle estates in Devonshire, but as he left no son this vast property passed, on the death of his brother, Mr. Mark Rolle, to their nephew, Lord Clinton. It was an extraordinary circumstance that the two brothers left seven daughters and no son, and a wonderful piece of good luck for Lord Clinton. Captain Brassey, who is in the 1st Life Guards, is the third son of the late Mr. Henry Brassey, and a brother of Lady March and of Mr. Leonard Brassey, M.P.

Lord Kitchener has gone to Egypt, and he will be absent from England until about the middle of May. He is to spend a few weeks at Cairo, and early in January he will proceed to the Upper Nile country on a hunting tour.

---

Lord Rosebery will make Dalmeny Park, his place near Edinburgh, his headquarters until he removes to Mentmore House for the winter. Lord Rosebery has been staying at Drumlanrig Castle on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch.

---

Mr. Frederick G. L. Meynell, who died on Friday, was a younger brother of Lord Halifax. He was called to the Bar in 1871, but never practised. For four years during Mr. Gladstone's first Administration he acted as private secretary to his father, who was then Lord Privy Seal. He assumed the name of Meynell in lieu of Wood early in 1905, when he succeeded to the extensive Meynell estates in Staffordshire (including the domain of Hoar Cross) under the will of his sister, Mrs. Meynell-Ingram. He was very popular in Staffordshire and was an excellent landlord.

---

Sir William Agnew was for over thirty years a prominent figure at Christie's, and many important galleries of modern pictures were formed by him for wealthy collectors, who in those days had a craze for the Victorian School, which has now fallen into utter contempt. He was a most persuasive art dealer; he often succeeded where his rivals, Gampart and Flatow, had failed, clever though they were. At an early period he recognised the value of Turner's pictures, and his purchase of seven of that painter's works at the Bicknell sale in 1863 for over 13,000 guineas proved highly profitable. In 1875 he purchased the Blenheim collection of camei and intagli en bloc for 35,000 guineas.

---

One of Sir William's most remarkable deals was his purchase of Frith's "Before Dinner at Boswell's Lodgings" for 4,350 guineas, in 1875. It was at once passed on (of course at an adequate profit) to Baron Grant, at whose sale a few years later the picture realised only 2,550 guineas, and it is not now worth one-tenth of its original value. It was by the advice of Sir William Agnew that Mr. Daniel Thwaites, of Blackburn, purchased Reynolds' "Ladies Waldegrave," which had been privately sold by Lord Carlingford, and he was among the first to recognise that the tide was about to flow for old masters and pictures of the Early English School, and that Victorian works were rapidly declining in value.

Sir William Agnew sat in Parliament as a Gladstonian Liberal from 1880 until 1886. It was in a great measure through an effective speech of his in the House and his private representations to members that Parliament voted £87,500 in 1885 for the purchase of the famous Blenheim Raphael and Van Dyck, which are now in the National Gallery. He pointed out that from the purely business point of view the purchase was a good one, owing to the greatly increased value of pictures of high class. It is probable that these two pictures would now realise at least a quarter of a million if they were offered for sale. Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lowe (Lord Sherbrooke) made a wonderful bargain in 1872 when they purchased the Peel collection for £70,000, as the Dutch and other pictures included in it would sell to-morrow for at least £350,000.

---

Mr. John Adams Acton, who died last week at his residence in Arran, was one of the most distinguished sculptors of the last half century, and his statues and busts have earned him world-wide fame. He gained many prizes at the Royal Academy, including a travelling scholarship, which sent him to Rome, where he studied under John Gibson, who formed a very high opinion of his artistic powers. He remained in Italy for ten years, and he did a great deal of work when staying at Rome, which was his headquarters. In the course of his life he executed busts of a host of distinguished personages, and his statue of Mr. Gladstone in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, is an admirable piece of work. Another of his successes was the recumbent statue of Cardinal Manning in the Westminster Cathedral, and his bust of Lord Brougham was warmly praised by Mr. Gladstone. He also executed many fine ideal figures.

Mr. W. J. Harris, of Halwill Manor, Devon, whose death was announced last week, was a pioneer of the small holdings system in the West of England. He had made a large fortune in the corn trade, and just forty years ago he purchased the Halwill estate from the Molesworths. The manor was Crown property until the reign of Edward IV., who granted it to John Fortescue. Mr. Harris successfully converted a few very large farms into small holdings, and the conditions of his tenancies were admirably fair, so that the estate had always been highly prosperous, while the tenants are flourishing and contented. About ten years ago Mr. Harris purchased the Crackington Manor estate, in North Cornwall, where he adopted the same system which had proved so beneficial on his Devonshire property. He objected to absentee landlords, so he built a house on the estate as an occasional residence. Mr. Harris sat in the House of Commons as Tory member for Poole for a short time during the Parliament of 1880, and in 1885 he unsuccessfully contested Mid Devon (as a "Fair Trader") against the late Mr. Seale Hayne. Mr. Harris happened to be in Paris in May, 1871, and he had a narrow escape of being shot during the Communist outbreak.

Motor Ambulance for Hire. Highly recommended by the medical profession.—THE DAIMLER MOTOR CO., Hire Dept., 78, Marylebone Lane, W. Tel, 10223 Central.

Lord and Lady Ancaster have arrived at Grimsthorpe Castle for the winter from Drummond Castle, Perthshire, where they had been residing since the beginning of August. There will be several shooting parties at Grimsthorpe during the next two months.

---

The statement which has been made in print that partridges are very scarce this season in Hampshire is incorrect. Lord Portsmouth's party of eight guns at Hurstbourne Park, near Whitchurch, killed 1,010 birds in two days in the Tupton and "Weekes" preserves. Lord Northbrook's party of six guns killed 794 birds in two days in the Micheldever, Newdown, and Borough Manor preserves. The Speaker and Lord Savile were included in Lord Northbrook's party.

---

Lord Houghton was much mortified about his failure in public life, but he would have been most amply compensated for his own disappointment if he could have anticipated that his son would become a Secretary of State and leader of the House of Lords when still in middle life. Lord Crewe inherits statesmanship from his grandfather, Mr. Pemberton Milnes, who was a very able man, and refused high Cabinet office about a century ago. If the offer then made to Mr. Milnes had been accepted he would have gone far. Nearly fifty years afterwards Lord Palmerston offered Mr. Milnes a peerage, which he declined, to the infinite vexation of his son, who was himself raised to the peerage seven or eight years later by the same Minister.

I heard the other day on pretty good authority that Lord Morley had resigned his post at the India Office in consequence of a difference of opinion as to the extent to which the Viceroy is in future to subordinate his views to those of the Secretary of State. I take no responsibility for the statement, but as it was made to me a clear week before the fact of Lord Morley's retirement transpired, my informant evidently knew one half of the truth, and may therefore have known the other. It is also certain that a strong feeling exists in India that under Lord Morley the Indian Government has been unduly interfered with by the Home Government, and Lord Hardinge must be aware of that feeling. But I am dealing in another column with Lord Morley's reign at the India Office, and there is no occasion to say more here.

This is to inform the Patrons of the GRAND HOTEL, CANNES, that a large Restaurant has recently been erected, overlooking the gardens.—A. MENGE, Proprietor.

The Unionists are right in pulling long faces over the Walthamstow election. Both sides expected that Sir John Simon's majority would be reduced; there were good reasons for expecting it. Instead of this it was increased by close on 600—and on a much smaller poll. This, too, is an old Unionist seat, lost in the "landslide" of 1906, and consequently due by this time to drift back towards its former allegiance. Sir John Simon, however, still holds it by a bigger majority than the Unionists had in their palmiest days.

One or two by-elections do not necessarily count for much. But, looking merely at the negative effect, Walthamstow confirms the impression created by South Shields that there is not much hope of the Unionists bettering their position at a general election in the immediate future. The South shows no more signs of reaction than the North—rather less, in fact. The party may well ask themselves what is the matter. The present Government, subject to the changes of personnel which come over all Governments in the progress of time, has now been in office five years—the normal life-time of an administration. It has survived a general election, but only by a narrow majority. In the ordinary course of things the country should now be showing a decided desire to get rid of it. If no such desire manifests itself at the period when it is normally due, the cause generally lies with the Opposition rather than the Government.

It is the business of the Unionists to discover for themselves why they fail to make headway; and I do not happen to be a Unionist myself, but I believe—up to a point—in party government, and for party government an effective Opposition is necessary. An Opposition cannot be effective as long as it has little or no chance of winning a general election. For this reason it would be no bad thing if the Unionists could find out what is wrong and put it to rights.

---

This, however, strikes me as likely to be very difficult, because my impresssion is that tariff reform is the real cause of the trouble; and the Tariff Reformers are the masters of the situation. We have seen them lately advising the sacrifice of one after another of the fundamental principles of the party; but not a suggestion is ever breathed that tariff reform should be jettisoned to lighten the ship. Their prophets blandly preach that the reform of the House of Lords and the repeal of the Act of Union should be treated as open questions—suitable matters for compromise, with a view to getting them out of the way and clearing the stage for a great Imperial constructive policy. We know that policy. It comes from Birmingham. As long as the most potent and energetic section of the party preaches in this spirit and gets up "reveilles" in order to inspire the leaders with it, is there much chance of a sweeping Unionist victory at the polls? I doubt it.

The Conference is now practically at the end of its labours. In less than a week we shall know the result. Although I am one of those who would prefer to see the House of Lords' question settled by general consent, and regard this result as worth some sacrifice of cherished ideals, I must say that if there is ever to be an appeal to the country on this question, the present seems a very promising time for it from the Liberal point of view. No one who values his reputation would ever predict the result of a general election. But the Liberals at present hold winning cards in all suits; they have by far the strongest team of players; and circumstances generally seem to be entirely in their favour. No one wants another general election so soon —especially almost on the eve of the Coronation. But as a mere matter of party tactics there is more to be gained by having it now than by postponing it for a year or two.

The Daily Chronicle published on Monday a long and most instructive article on Anglo-German relations, founded upon interviews with all sorts and conditions of leading men in Germany, from the highest political sphere downwards and outwards. I understand that it is the personal work of Mr. Donald. The most striking points in it are, first, the evidence of almost universal soreness at the persistent antagonism of England to the legitimate development of German interests outside Germany; and, secondly, the widespread, though perhaps not universal desire, that the relations of the two countries should be put on a more friendly footing. It cannot be too widely understood in this country that the Germans have real and not merely sentimental grievances against British policy; that they have solid grounds for regarding us as hostile to them, and distrusting our designs for the future. If this were adequately understood, we should see Germany in a very different light, and treat the question of competitive armaments in a very different spirit.

At the same time, the fault is not entirely on our side. The German views reflected in the Daily Chronicle are in some instances as obviously unreasonable as some of the views about German policy current in this country. For example, it is absurd of Germans to call it "exasperating" that we should try to prevent their getting exclusive control of the Bagdad Railway, still more that we should combine with Russia to establish a sort of joint dominion over Persia. Our interests in Southern and Eastern Asia are much more substantial and of far longer standing than those of Germany. That we should scheme and strive to strengthen or even extend them is natural and legitimate; and when Germany finds herself inconvenienced or pulled up short in her own schemes as the result of our doing so, for her to attribute this to gratuitous desire to injure her is as absurd as for us to see nothing but a design of attacking England when she builds warships for the defence of her commerce and her coasts against a possible English attack.

But it would be infinitely better that, when conflicting interests arise between European States in other parts of the world they should be adjusted in a friendly spirit between the Governments of the two countries, than that the two should set to work to see which can "best" the other by smart manœuvring and diplomatic chicanery. A few years ago we were in this last position in relation both to France and Russia. We have found it much more advantageous in both cases, and perfectly easy, to substitute the alternative policy of friendly negotiation and adjustment. There can be no question that this would be equally advantageous and equally easy in the case of Germany, if only we went to work in the right spirit.

It is the business of a Liberal Government to do this, and our present Foreign Secretary is quite capable of doing it. It is no use arguing about armaments or negotiating for their reduction. The business-like course is to make a joint attempt to remove all friction and all grounds for the suspicion on either side that the other is pursuing an "exasperating" policy, or is actuated by hostile sentiments. When this is done, the competition in armaments will very soon come to an end. South Africa is rejoicing at this moment over its unification and pacification. This is the greatest work that has been accomplished under the present Government, not excepting old-age pensions and the taxation of ground landlords. But the pacification of Europe is of far wider consequence to mankind than the pacification of South Africa, and a friendly understanding between ourselves and Germany is the first step towards it.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has presented the Dean of Grahamstown (Dr. F. E. Carter) to the rectory of Hadleigh, Essex, vacant by the death of Dean Fryer, which is of the net value of about £750 a year, with residence. Dr. Carter was for some years Tait Missioner in the diocese of Canterbury. The titular deanery of Bocking (one of the old "peculiars") is annexed to the rectory of Hadleigh, which benefice has been twice vacated in less than two years.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon has presented the Rev. H. E. Victor, vicar of Holy Trinity, Hastings, to the rectory of Singleton, near Chichester. There is an interesting church at Singleton, and the village is beautifully situated in the picturesque country between Goodwood and Petworth.

The death of the Rev. P. C. Rossiter, Rector of Sampford Peverell, Devon, is very much regretted, as he was one of the most popular parish clergymen in the West of England. He was for many years curate to his uncle, who was rector of Sampford Peverell for half a century, and whom he succeeded in the living. He was distinguished as a preacher. Mr. Rossiter was possessed of large private means, and he delighted in carrying out all kinds of improvements in his parish, to which he made many important gifts of permanent value, while his charities were most munificent. He will be greatly missed. The living is of the net value of about £260 a year, with an excellent residence. The patronage now passes from the family of the late rector to Keble College. The fine church was carefully restored some years ago.

The Rev. Alexander Harper, whose death was announced last week, was a well-known and highly distinguished clergyman of the Church of Scotland. He had been minister of the important parish of Wishaw for forty years. Mr. Harper was a man of great scientific attainments, and he was a recognised specialist in geology and mineralogy. The most notable episode in his ministerial career was his part in the famous "banns case," which caused much excitement in Scotland. All the ecclesiastical experts were strongly against Mr. Harper, but the Court of Session and the House of Lords unanimously decided in his favour. His notes on the case were so masterly that they were handed up to the judges by counsel. He was a wide-minded man and a zealous promoter of popular education.

The Philanthropic Society, of which the Duke of Connaught is President, has long carried on a useful work in the reclamation of poor boys whose future is endangered by unfavourable circumstances and bad surroundings. Nearly 7,000 have been trained in the Farm School, Redhill, with the most satisfying results. Colonel Sir Charles Frederick, one of the Vice-Presidents of the Society, is now making an appeal on behalf of the school, which is in urgent need of funds and well deserves the support of the charitable public.

Lord Lanesborough has resigned the appointment of Military Secretary to the Governor-General of Canada, and he is on his way back to England, and will rejoin his regiment, the Coldstream Guards.

I continue to receive letters confirming the views put forward in TRUTH regarding the injustice done to military officers by the present system of confidential reports. One of my correspondents—a civilian—quotes the case of an officer who was told by the retiring colonel of his regiment that he had reported well about him. On the faith of this assurance the officer applied for a certain appointment for which he was recommended by his new colonel, and also by the general of the district, but his name was ruled out on the ground that his former colonel's report was such as to disqualify him for the appointment concerned.

Under paragraph 138 of the King's Regulations an unfavourable report, when made by a superior, should be communicated to the officer reported on; but to avoid so unpleasant a duty a commanding officer often uses language which, without being directly condemnatory, damns an officer with such faint praise as to ruin his chances of advancement when his name comes up for consideration with others. This would be prevented if commanding officers were required by regulation on all occasions when they report on officers to read what they write to them in the presence of the second-in-command and adjutant of the regiment. After hearing the report, if an officer felt that he had not been fairly treated he should be allowed to lodge a protest under Section 42 of the Army Act, and this should be dealt with on its merits by the Army Council. Instead of being in the dark officers would then know where they were as regards their future prospects.

Like other public servants military officers should be told their faults and how to correct them; but under the present system of confidential reports they are more often than not kept in ignorance of their shortcomings till it is too late to mend their ways. The relations between a commanding officer and his subalterns should be confidential to outsiders, but not to themselves. Mr. Haldane would earn the eternal gratitude of the Service if he would put an end to the system under which officers can be stabbed in the back without being given a chance of defence. This is another of those problems which is not beyond his power to solve.

With reference to the remarks in last week's TRUTH on the duty of Army Medical officers in regard to the sanitary condition of houses let in lodgings to soldiers, a Service correspondent, who is in a position to speak with authority on this matter, suggests that the best way of dealing with insanitary houses, wherever they exist, is for the G.O.C., on the advice of the P.M.O., to place such houses out of bounds. It seems clear that if pressure were put on the owners of insanitary house property in this way they would very soon set their houses in order, and, as a matter of fact, my correspondent relates one case in which this effect was produced very promptly. But, of course, it is necessary in the first instance that subordinate medical officers should keep a sharp eye on the sanitary condition of houses occupied by soldiers.

A few years ago the department responsible for the payment of soldiers' pensions discontinued the practice of forwarding remittances to pensioners in envelopes marked in such a way as to indicate the nature of their contents. This was done after the evil results of the practice had been pressed on the notice of the War Office in TRUTH for I cannot remember how many years previously. It has now come to my notice that the practice has been re-established—not precisely in its original shape, but in one open to precisely the same objections, the envelopes being marked with the initials of the pensioner's regiment, and the name of the local Army Accounts office. A pensioner, having objected recently to this inscription on the envelopes, was told that it was done by War Office instructions. This was possibly rather an over-statement of the truth, but the War Office is responsible, and it consequently becomes necessary for me once more to invite War Office attention to the matter. May I respectfully request the gallant Secretary, or whoever else prepares the agenda, to note this little item for consideration at the next meeting of the Army Council?

Is it in accordance with the regulations respecting proficiency pay that men should be disqualified from it on account of entries in their conduct sheets, no matter how trifling? I ask because rules to this effect are in force in the 8th Hussars, now at Lucknow—an entry in his squadron conduct sheet disqualifying a man for proficiency pay for six months, and in his regimental conduct sheet for twelve months. Men otherwise qualified thus forfeit their proficiency pay for trumpery offences involving two or three days' C.B. There is nothing that I can see in the regulations attaching such conditions to proficiency pay, and it seems misplaced zeal for a commanding officer to institute such conditions on his own account. The object of proficiency pay is to induce men to improve and enlarge their professional attainments, and if they lose the pay for any trifling fault in conduct they have no longer the inducement to become proficient soldiers.

A correspondent in India sends me a vivid picture of the unfortunate lot of Mrs. Atkins, who, in obedience to the benevolent despotism of the Indian Army authorities, takes her enforced summer holidays in the hills. He lives at Sunnybank, a halting place on the route between Rawal Pindi and the camp at Khanspur, where the women and children from the plains are housed under canvas, and he tells me that at the end of the summer season rarely a day passes but what women and their children, some of the latter being babies in arms, sit by the roadside for hours exposed to the hot sun waiting for the bullock carts which are to convey them on the next stage of their journey. The journey from Khanspur to Rawal Pindi is 36½ miles. The first stage to Sunnybank, about 16 miles, performed in dandies, takes from five to six hours. The second stage is done in bullock carts which take between twenty and twenty-four hours to perform the journey.

Between the two stages the unfortunate travellers are turned out on the roadside for three or four hours, and neither then nor at any stage on the journey is there made any provision for their comfort or their physical necessities. They have no opportunity of obtaining a cup of tea or even water for toilet purposes unless some good Samaritan takes compassion on them. Crowded with their luggage into springless and seatless bullock carts they are left to provide for themselves as best they can. No doubt it is greatly to the advantage of Mrs. Atkins and the juvenile Tommies that they should spend the summer away from the heat of the plains, but that is no reason why they should be treated rather worse than cattle in their transit to and from their holiday camp.

I gave last week some observations of an officer on the needless hardships which soldiers still undergo on troopships. The following observations of a non-commissioned officer on the same matter are well worth quoting:—

I arrived from India only a few months ago by the Plassy, and can truthfully say that the conditions under which the third class travelled were disgraceful. In this instance the boat was only about half full, but we experienced the greatest difficulty in getting any water to wash with, it being only turned on for one hour morning and evening. As this hour was also allotted for serving breakfast and tea, it will readily be understood how inadequate were the arrangements for ablution. What would have been the result had a full complement been embarked!

I have over ten years' experience, and have travelled in four different troopships, but regret to say that the conditions to-day are as bad as ten years ago. The officers embarked are not to blame for this; they do their best, but the men are on board and must perforce be put somewhere irrespective of rank.

I do not believe the public know that the senior non-commissioned officers travel third class. On the Plassy were many men sent home for discharge as worthless—the black sheep of the Army—and yet senior class N.C.O.'s were treated on the ship in just the same way as these men, and not even placed apart.

The reforms needed are simply a matter of £ s. d. They may be classed as follows:—

(a) Increased washing and lavatory accommodation;

(b) An intermediate class for senior N.C.O. ranks, to include a mess room and second class food;

(c) Reduction of number of men carried, so as to enable all to find proper sleeping accommodation;

(d) All bedding to be cleaned after each outward and homeward journey.

The writer of this letter adds that he is voicing the feelings of thousands of men. Of this there can be no doubt whatever. If Mr. Haldane, amid all the cares of his office, could find time to look into this matter, he has it in his power to confer benefits upon soldiers which will make his name blessed in the Army for at least the lifetime of the present military generation. As my correspondent observes, the question is simply one of £ s. d.; but if Mr. Haldane were to go to Parliament next spring with a request for the few pounds necessary to enable our soldiers and their families to travel to and from India in something like decency and comfort, there is not a member who would dare to get up and object to the expenditure when the present state of the case had been properly explained. This is not a question of "armaments."

Since penning the foregoing remarks I have received the following from a Service correspondent with a long memory. It makes two practical suggestions, neither of which involves a heavy addition to the Army Estimates:—

In the now so much despised days of the late Duke of Cambridge, when troops were conveyed in the old troopships, the cleanliness of the men was amply provided for in an abundant supply of salt water, supplied from sources outside the ship. Every soldier had in his sea kit a piece of "marine soap," that lathered in sea water. This is now not issued. Also in the morning sail baths were provided for both officers and men, supplied by water pumped through hoses. These baths were going from 6 a.m. to 7 a.m., while the decks were being swabbed. On the present-day transports no sail baths are provided.

Vice-Admiral Prince Louis of Battenberg will next week vacate the command of the Atlantic Fleet, his two years' term being then completed. It is probable that Prince and Princess Louis will spend a considerable part of the winter in Russia, where they are to be the guests of the Emperor and Empress at Tsarskoe Selo. They will also visit the Grand Duchess Elizabeth at Moscow. Princess Louis is now residing at the Château of Heiligenberg, where she will be joined next week by her husband.

Admiral Sir Harry Rawson had a most distinguished naval career, which extended over forty-four years, and he obtained a high reputation for practical usefulness. He was afterwards Governor of New South Wales, and he made himself so popular that his term of office was extended for a year. His unfailing tact, his kindly goodwill, his sound judgment, and his zeal for all deserving causes made him a great favourite in Australia.

Captain Herbert J. Savill has been selected by Rear-Admiral Paul Bush as flag-captain on assuming command of the Cape of Good Hope station. Captain Savill, who is at present in charge of the Special Service ships at Devonport, acted as flag-commander to Admiral Sir Lewis Beaumont, the last C.I.C. at the Western port. He served in the Bathurst Expedition under Sir Frederick Bedford, during which he was wounded.

Captain C. E. Tower is succeeding Captain Thursby in command of the battleship Swiftsure, when that vessel recommissions on the 22nd inst. Captain Tower has seen much active service, from the time when, as a sub-lieutenant in the Northumberland, he was present at the bombardment of Alexandria, down to the Somali Expedition of 1904. It is regarded as certain in Service circles that the Swiftsure, with her sister-ship the Triumph, will be very shortly detached from the Home Fleet to augment the Mediterranean Fleet.

The principle of employing younger officers for high commands which our Admiralty has been carrying into effect for some years past seems to have spread to Germany. But the Germans are going several points better. At the request of the Kaiser the Marine Amt has promulgated a regulation that in future no officer more than forty-five years of age is to be posted to a "Dreadnought" for command. Here is fresh matter for our naval alarmists to worry over. With two exceptions, all our "Dreadnought" skippers range from forty-five to fifty-five—the age for compulsory retirement of a British post-captain.

The experiments against submarine "A1" at Portsmouth last week seem to have perplexed the newspaper men who were bidden to make a "story" out of them. One version was that the Admiralty desired to ascertain what would happen if the periscope were shot away. We shall be told next that the Admiralty has been experimenting with "Dreadnoughts" in order to ascertain what would happen if the captain's epaulettes were shot away.

A naval correspondent writes to me on the inadequacy of the sick-berth staff at Stonehouse Naval Hospital, adding a suggestion that a similar state of affairs may possibly exist at Haslar. The immediate cause of the shortage at Stonehouse is the furnishing of sick-bay ratings to the Balmoral Castle. It seems that in reply to a signal a few days ago the Inspector-General reported that he was fifteen attendants short of established strength. He might have added, but did not, that most of his staff were working ninety-one hours a week regularly, and that these men had not been allowed the customary week-end leave for more than two months. The shortage was made up by drawing upon the sick-berth ratings of warships in port. By this method of robbing Peter to pay Paul the Stonehouse Hospital is now only three ratings below strength. But of course the same number of sick cases remain to be nursed, and as the ships in harbour have had their sick-bay attendants withdrawn they have to send their invalids ashore to hospital.

The surprising thing is that, amid this serious shortage in the sick-berth staff, to which I have before drawn attention, the most unintelligible anomalies are permitted to exist. At the very time that the Stonehouse staff was being worked off its feet by shortage of numbers eight fully-trained and qualified sick-berth attendants were employed in cooking for the rest of the hospital. Had these eight men been replaced by a like number of regular cook ratings the strain would have been greatly relieved. To any but an official mind it would seem that the place for a nursing attendant is in the wards, not in the kitchen.

One hundred per cent. of hits at 5,000 yards range by battleship divisions steaming at a speed unknown to one another is certainly fine torpedo practice. Two very significant points are demonstrated by this performance of the First Home Fleet in Scottish waters a few days since. The first is the immensely improved efficiency of the torpedo. The second is the greatly increased vulnerability of the modern warship to this form of aggression. This latter condition is entirely due to the growth of dimensions. The First Home Fleet consists of "Dreadnoughts," averaging considerably over 500 ft. in length, or about 100 ft. more than the biggest battleships of the pre-Dreadnought era. There has been a tendency to discredit the value of the torpedo since the Russo-Japanese War, because neither side proved particularly successful with this method of attack.

Apropos of torpedoes, I see that the Weymouth Town Council have refused to grant permission to Messrs. Whitehead to run their new torpedoes experimentally in the bay. The parochial-minded majority considered that such practice would be dangerous. This is a view which, by a bare possibility, might have also presented itself to the Whitehead authorities, who, realising their responsibilty and liability, might conceivably take adequate precautions. I presume that the Weymouth Town Council have some claim to exercise jurisdiction beyond the surf that fringes their sands, otherwise Messrs. Whitehead would not have asked permission to carry out these experiments. But it would be interesting to know how they have become possessed of functions elsewhere reserved to the Admiralty or Trinity House.

There is a rumour that the Government contemplate the creation of a staff of officials to prepare the bills of quantities for Government building works hitherto entrusted to independent quantity surveyors. In particular, the Admiralty is said to desire this in order to provide permanent berths for some of the temporary men originally engaged in the late Works Loan Department and since drafted into the Works Department. The course proposed appears open to serious objections. Quantity surveying is highly technical work, requiring years of professional training, and it is most unlikely that a scratch staff of official surveyors would be able to do it with the same efficiency as the various experienced firms recognised on the Government lists. It is, too, work for which there is a necessarily irregular demand in any department. Sometimes a big staff would be kept busy, at other times they would have practically nothing to do.

Apart from the questions of efficiency and cost, the independent position of the outside surveyor is of considerable value in connection with contracts for public buildings, barracks, docks, breakwaters, etc. His bills of quantities are accepted with confidence both by the department and by the contractors whose tenders are based on these quantities. But it is not at all probable that the contractors would repose the same confidence in bills got out by officials of the department concerned. If not, the result would be that expenses (added eventually, of course, to the amount of the contract) would be incurred in checking the quantities, and disputes would be almost certain to arise. Not only the Admiralty, the Office of Works, and (partly at least) the War Office, but many public bodies, companies, and private individuals engaged in extensive building operations have found it advantageous to employ independent quantity surveyors, and the abandonment of the system by the Government would be a great mistake.

The principle of paying civil policemen for apprehending naval leave-breakers seems to me all wrong. The knowledge that he will receive a reward of a sovereign for snapping a bluejacket who has overstayed his time ashore is a great inducement to a constable to temper vigilance with allurement—in other words, to lay traps for Jack. There seems reason to believe that this is done to a considerable degree in some of the naval stations. Portland appears to have the worst reputation in this respect, the Weymouth police making a fat harvest out of rounding-up leave-breakers. The fact that this reward is stopped out of the pay of the defaulter does not put a more pleasing aspect upon the practice.

The International Who's Who Publishing Company have apparently now turned their attention to India, for the last mail has brought me a number of their circulars which have been addressed both to military men and civilians. For the benefit of my Indian readers let me therefore repeat the warning I have already given—that the International book is in no way connected with Messrs. Black's well-known "Who's Who," which is not compiled on the principle of admission by payment.

A correspondent, pinning his remarks on to Mr. Lloyd George's recent speech on "Social Waste," writes to me at some length on the financial waste that has resulted from the acquisition and working of the telegraph service by the Post Office, and argues from this that somebody should interfere before the telephone service is thrown into the same "bottomless pit." To the best of my information and belief the transfer of the telephones to the Post Office in 1911 has been a legal fait accompli for years past, and could not be disturbed without an Act of Parliament involving a gross breach of faith. The suggestion, therefore, is hardly worth serious discussion. But my correspondent reproduces a good many current misapprehensions on the subject of the telegraph service which deserve notice.

It is quite true that the State made a very bad bargain when it took over the telegraphs. That was primarily the fault of the Postmaster-General of that day. But the idea that the telegraphs have been working since that date at a loss to the country is somewhat fallacious, especially when the figures are manipulated in the fashion adopted by my correspondent, who manages to pile up a total loss of £38,300,000 in forty years. For one thing, the loss on working has been explained by more than one Postmaster-General to be principally due to the cheap rates granted to the press. The justification for this is that the cheap dissemination of news is to the public interest. But whether we look at press telegrams or private telegrams, there is every reason to suppose that a great economy in working is effected by the combination of the telegraph service with the rest of the business of the Post Office. If that is so a private contractor certainly could not make the service pay at the present rates. Whether it could be made to pay in the face of telephone competition if the charges were raised is also extremely doubtful. But even if it were so, the public does not necessarily lose money when a service of which it gets the benefit is conducted at a loss. The public is getting its service below cost price, which means a saving of money. If a profit were made by raising rates, the profit would come out of the pockets of the public. Nothing would be "saved."

The gentleman who writes to me on this subject, in piling up his statistics of loss mentions that since 1876 about 10 millions has been expended on new construction (i.e., capital account), but has been treated as current expenditure. If this figure is correct the 10 millions must obviously be deducted from the loss on the trading account during that period. It is income which has been capitalised. The effect of this is to reduce the loss on the trading account since 1870 by more than one-half. It averages, in fact, little over £200,000 a year for the whole period. There does not, therefore, seem much ground for apprehending disastrous results from the transfer of the telephones to the Post Office.

In point of fact, the Post Office is more open to criticism on the ground of undue regard for economy in its administration than for extravagance. Owing to the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer looks to it for a considerable revenue, every detail of its administration is closely watched by the Financial Department of Government. There are those who hold—I am one of them myself — that a public service of this kind ought not to be worked at a profit. The public should receive the profits in the shape of improvement or cheapening of service. If, as now happens, a big profit is made and credited to the country in the Budget, the effect is that the country is indirectly taxed through the department. I should like to see the whole Post Office administered on somewhat the same principle as the telegraphs, and I shall take the liberty of advocating this in regard to the telephone service when it is taken over.

The sender of a telegram to an Orient liner anchored off Tilbury the other day was subsequently called upon by the Post Office to pay "one shilling, boat hire, as vessel was in river." Is this usual? The sender of this telegram happened to know that steam tenders were constantly plying between the pier and the vessel, that no charge was made to those having business on board, and that the telegraph messenger delivered in one journey a large number of telegrams. If, therefore, the shilling was demanded in every case the Post Office must have netted a good many shillings by a quite unjustifiable impost.

A notable tribute to the advance which the International Correspondence Schools is making in regard to technical education is afforded by the weekly edition of the I.C.S. Student. This little sheet, which is prepared for circulation amongst the students of the schools only, does not contain a single word about the schools themselves, but consists entirely of particulars of vacancies offered by employers to I.C.S. students. A more practical acknowledgment of the value of the training given could not be imagined.

I am glad to see that the Board of Trade Juvenile Advisory Committees are getting to work in the matter of boy and girl labour, which is the crux of the whole question of unemployment. There would be few "unemployables" if there were no "blind alley" employment. Casual juveniles become casual adults. It becomes, therefore, the duty of Labour Exchanges to check the flow of children into casual occupations. But Labour Exchanges cannot do much without the help of the educational authorities. This is where the Board of Education comes in. The Board should drop their Education (Choice of Employment) Bill, which was smuggled through the Commons last summer, but hung up in the Lords. If the Bill were to become law its only effect would be to legalise faddism. What is wanted is, not legislation, but directions to the local education authorities as to how they should work in harmony with the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges. If the Government really want to grapple with the evil of unemployable labour the two departments concerned must work together and not at cross purposes.

What is clear from the Board of Trade monthly returns is that there is no surplus labour of the right sort in the country, but a large surplus of the wrong sort. Now that this is known it is for the Boards of Trade and Education, each working on departmental lines, to make the latter kind of surplus fit to supply the demand for skilled labour. All talk about interfering with parental responsibility is rubbish. When a parent is out of work he has quite enough responsibility in finding bread for his children without being particular as to how they get it.

The Liverpool meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society proved a great success, although the circumstances were in some respects most unfavourable, and there is a profit of about £5,400. Next year's show is to be held at Norwich during the last week in June (the week after the Coronation), and King George is the President-elect. It is expected that some of the foreign Princes who are then to be in England will visit Norwich during the show week, and a large party of distinguished guests will be entertained at Sandringham. The next meeting of 1912 is to be at Doncaster, and it has just been settled that in 1913 the Royal show is to be held at Bristol, where the Durdham Downs afford a most excellent site for the various enclosures and buildings.

Haverfordwest has suffered considerably from an epidemic of diphtheria, and at a recent meeting of the Rural District Council it was pointed out that the outbreak was due to the insanitary condition of the schools, since as soon as the schools were closed no fresh cases occurred, while immediately upon their reopening there was a fresh outbreak. There seems good reason for believing that this is the true explanation, for it was stated that while in the past the schools were washed out and disinfected weekly, now the schools are only washed out once a month and disinfectants can only be obtained by special order and as a special favour. The responsibility for this condition of affairs therefore clearly rests with the Pembrokeshire Education Committee, and if they fail to realise it I trust the local medical officer of health will not fail to take steps to make them do so.

I have received a letter signed by the Chairman of the Health Committee of the Wrexham Town Council and the Medical Officer of Health for the borough, explaining that there was never any intention on the part of the Wrexham Town Council to keep back the highly interesting report on the outbreak of infectious disease in the borough and district furnished them by the Royal Institute of Public Health. They explain that the final report was only received on October 22, and the Rural District Council, the other authority concerned, only had an opportunity of confirming it on November 4, and they state that they intend to publish the report in the scientific press as early as possible. If any other impression got abroad I am afraid it was due to the Wrexham Town Council having kept their intentions so strictly to themselves, for to judge by debates on the subject in the council chamber, some of the councillors themselves seem to have been unaware of the council's intention.

The Holsworthy guardians last week held an investigation into the cause of injuries sustained by a ten-year-old boy under their care, and found that they were the result of a severe thrashing inflicted by a county alderman and J.P. named Higgs, who had been annoyed by boys trespassing on his property. The guardians demanded a public apology, which Mr. Higgs refused to give, and it was then decided that unless the apology was forthcoming within a week he should be prosecuted. Such a decision is worthy of the best traditions of Bumble. Either the county alderman deserved to be prosecuted or he did not, and if he did he ought not to be allowed to escape with an apology.

In the municipal elections at Grimsby Mr. J. Whiteley Wilkin, a Nonconformist and teetotaler and the Liberal nominee for the mayoralty, was opposed by Major Crosby, who is connected with the brewing industry. The Grimsby News expressed its displeasure at the Major's opposition to the mayor-elect, and added:—

> There are no signs that he (Major Crosby) will be victorious, but whatever happens he can only blame himself now if this is remembered against him when his trade is involved or the music hall he is interested in needs some extension of favour. The game of "tit-for-tat" is two-sided, and can be joined in by licensing magistrates as well as by others.

In other words, it is threatened that the licensing magistrates—meaning those of them who are Liberals—will misuse their authority by way of retaliation on Major Crosby for his temerity in standing against Mr. Wilkin for the Council. I trust that the magistrates do not merit this disgraceful reflection upon their judicial impartiality, and I hope it is not true that the editor of the journal in which it appears is himself a J.P.

"The amending hand" is at last to be laid on the Court of Record of the Hundred of Salford. That, I take it, is the meaning of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's appointment of a Departmental Committee under the chairmanship of Lord Mersey to inquire into the practice and procedure of this ancient institution. The misuse of its jurisdiction, more especially at the instance of the moneylending fraternity, has long been a scandal. There are bloodsuckers whose selection of Manchester as their headquarters has been due to the fact that they thereby became entitled to employ the machinery of this local court for squeezing and crushing debtors in all parts of the country. It lends itself to that purpose much more readily than the High Court or the County Courts, and I have related case after case in which poor wretches of borrowers living at great distances from Manchester, so that it was impossible for them to put in an appearance, have been dealt with most oppressively under judgments of the Salford Court. It is, I think, practically certain that Lord Mersey and his colleagues will recommend a sweeping curtailment of the area of the Court's jurisdiction, and highly probable that its procedure will also be reformed.

The pompous bigwigs of the East Langbaurgh, Guisborough, bench, certainly did not realise the alterations which have taken place recently at the Home Office. They had sent a man to prison for fourteen days for begging. It was a first offence, and the Home Office, after ascertaining the facts, ordered his release. Then the East Langbaurgh justices asked the reasons why their decision had been over-ridden. The Home Office supplied them. Thereupon the magistrates passed a resolution of protest against the action of the Home Secretary as a misuse of prerogative, and as bringing the administration of the law into disrepute; and asking for an assurance that their sentences will not be set aside in the future without first communicating with them. The sharp reproof administered to them by the Home Secretary was well deserved. It is unwise administration which brings the law into disrepute and not the rectification of magisterial blunders by the Home Office

A novel case of game trespass was heard last week at Belper Petty Sessions, in the Children's Court, a crippled boy of fifteen being charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. He had been employed to look after the pheasants belonging to a Mr. Raphael, and one of the birds having flown into a field over which a Mr. Waite had the shooting rights, he went into the field and frightened it back. The solicitor for the defence characterised the prosecution as an abuse of the criminal law, and most people will be inclined to agree with him. Not so the magistrates, however, for they fined the lad 1s. and 1s. costs, though ordering that the conviction should not be recorded against him. The conviction seems to me, on the face of it, a wrongful one, though the point whether you are justified in trespassing on another man's land to drive your own birds back to your own land is a nice one. If instead of a crippled boy, the defendant had been a wealthy game preserver, the case might have provided the lawyers with work for years to come before its final decision by the House of Lords.

At the Ystradd Rhondda Police Court last week a collier was charged with cruelty to his three-year-old step-daughter. The left side of her face was one continuous bruise, she had two black eyes, and was also bruised about the body, the result of punishment inflicted because she would not go to sleep. The magistrate merely imposed a fine of £2, remarking that it was clear the defendant had lost his temper when he was not sober. I should have thought a stipendiary magistrate would hardly have found these sufficient reasons for treating such brutality so leniently.

At Dublin Northern Police-court last week a man and his wife were charged with cruelty to a boy of eight, the man's stepson. The child had been repeatedly beaten with a heavy leather belt, and turned out into the streets, where he was found shivering with cold at three o'clock in the morning. These unnatural parents were merely fined 10s. each. Both English and Irish stipendiaries might be expected to set the unpaid magistracy a better example.

For stealing two penny meat pies from a shop, Mr. d'Eyncourt last week sent a young labourer to prison for three weeks. The man pleaded that he was tired, hungry, and drenched to the skin, and after taking the pies he had asked to be locked up. Mr. d'Eyncourt told him that the only thing to be done with men like him was to give them rather more than they bargained for, and the severe sentence already mentioned was the result. This seems to me faulty reasoning on Mr. d'Eyncourt's part. If the man's story was true he was a fit object for sympathy. For a starving man to help himself to a couple of penny pies is surely a venial offence, and the sentence imposed is more likely to make the victim decide in the future that he may as well be hung for a sheep as for a lamb, and thus transform him into an habitual criminal.

In view of the unspeakable Widdows' recent return to Motherwell on a fresh Protestant campaign, a Glasgow gentleman has sent me an offer to stake £50, to be paid over to a charity if Widdows will furnish proof of his right to describe himself as an "-ex-Monk" of the Roman Catholic Church. As I have told my correspondent privately, it seems hardly worth while making the challenge, in view of the fact that Widdows' claim to the title of ex-Monk has already been conclusively proved to be false. In 1878 Widdows had been appearing at a number of meetings in Glasgow under the auspices of the late Mr. H. Long, then and for some time after a strenuous leader of the Protestant party in the town. Widdows' right to style himself ex-Monk was challenged by the Rev. Dr. Glancy, who offered to lodge £50 with the Glasgow Herald if Mr. Long would stake a similar amount, the whole sum to be handed to Mr. Long if Widdows' assertion were proved to be correct, and in the other eventuality the £100 was to be given to the Catholic Schools at Motherwell.

Mr. Long accepted the challenge, and the money was staked. He was then asked to name the monastery in which Widdows had been a monk. He answered that it was in Norwich. Dr. Glancy thereupon showed that there was no Catholic monastery in Norwich, nor had been since the time of the Reformation. The money was accordingly awarded to the Catholic Schools, and besides admitting the justice of the award, Mr. Long afterwards had the courage to publicly admit that he had been misled by Widdows, and to disown his mendacious protégé. Evidently the Motherwell Protestants are wilfully ignorant or supernaturally blind to the character of their champions.

The latest addition to the ranks of the catarrh specialists is one Elmer Shirley, of 6, Great James Street, London, W.C., though there is such a family likeness between his literature and cure and that of Erasmus Colman that they might both very well emanate from the same factory. Shirley's remedies consist of a "Medicator," "Nebular" for charging the same, "Katones," and Lotions, a complete fit-out costing one guinea. He also gives a guarantee to refund the whole of the purchase money if the purchaser has, in his or her opinion, not derived any benefit from two weeks' use of the same. This looks like straightforward business, but Shirley's office is only a small one on the third floor in an inexpensive neighbourhood, and it never does to place too much reliance on a quack's guarantee.

Another newcomer in the world of quackery who makes great play with a guarantee is one of the fat-cure brigade, who advertises as the Dr. Turner Company, of 147, Great Portland Street, London, W. "Dr." Turner undertakes with his famous "Triplex System" to make a remarkable reduction in your weight in sixty days' time, or refund you the two guineas you have paid him for the secret of his treatment. I must confess that this fat reducer excites my curiosity. The Triplex System, according to its discoverer, entails the taking of no medicine or drugs, no physical culture or strenuous exercise, no dieting, no Turkish baths or sweating processes of any kind. All you have to do is to send two guineas and a promise of secrecy, and by return of post you will be in the happy possession of the means by which you can fade away into a shadow of your former self. There seems to be no doubt that you will be lightened to the extent of two pounds.

A lady sends me a letter which she received recently from a Mrs. D. Nordman, of 29, Cathcart Hill, Highgate, London, N., after a gratifying announcement in the first column of the Morning Post. Accompanying the letter was a knitted garment, and as on previous occasions she had received similar letters accompanied by similar requests to purchase babies' garments, my correspondent had doubts as to whether she would not be doing Mrs. Nordman a disservice by purchasing the article. I do not like to be hard on women who sell goods by these little dodges, but really there is very little to distinguish their methods from those of the ordinary begging letter writers. Mrs. Nordman makes no very lengthy appeal. She merely states that she is in reduced circumstances, but from all I can learn there are no signs of financial stress about her home surroundings.

Sweet are the uses of advertisement! A firm of Hungarian lottery touts, Charles Kiss and Co., now embellish their circulars with the proud boast, "The famous Dr. Crippen, our client in 1907," and a facsimile is given of his letter ordering four quarter tickets "in odd numbers." The heading to the letter shows that at that time his activities included an advertising business styled "The Imperial Press Agency." There is no accounting for tastes, but I should think myself that Charles Kiss and Co. are mistaken in supposing that this eminent murderer's patronage will recommend their firm to the public.

Now and again I receive requests for information about some pseudo-philanthropic enterprise with a high-sounding title, which makes me marvel at the sweet simplicity of my fellow-creatures. Such an inquiry reached me the other day in regard to the National Union for the Suppression of Intemperance. My correspondent wanted to know if the Union is genuine, if it does any good, and if it is worth supporting. My answer is: look at the annual report and balance sheet. I have been looking at these documents myself, and I see no reason to doubt the concern's genuineness. It has a chairman, a treasurer, a secretary, agents, auditors, bankers, and an executive committee, and a host of honorary district secretaries. It is true that it can hardly claim to be a national institution, for it appears to confine its energies to Manchester and the surrounding district. But there can be no doubt of its existence.

Whether the National Union does any good and whether it is worth supporting are different matters altogether. In the year covered by the report which

The two six-cylinder NOISELESS NAPIER cars exhibited at the Brussels Exhibition have received the highest award, viz., the Grand Prix. Six-cylinder Napier cars are British and best.

I have examined it appears to have held two meetings, passed a number of resolutions, and forwarded several memorials to different members of the Government. To do this work it has collected and expended £300. In the balance-sheet the expenses of the meetings are put down as £8 14s. 6d.; the printing bill amounts to £42; while postages run away with £23. Probably a good proportion of these sums are expended on the printing of the annual report and posting it to subscribers, and it looks to me as if £50 would leave an ample margin for the whole of the expenditure upon the actual work of the National Union. The whole of the rest of the money is disbursed in salaries, collectors' commissions and expenses, and office expenses. Even granted that the National Union does £50 worth of good, £250 seems an extravagant price to pay for doing it, and if I were wishing to subscribe to temperance propaganda I should certainly choose a medium for getting rid of my cash which showed a closer relationship between the work done and the expenditure.

SCRUTATOR.

LORD MORLEY AND INDIA.

THE departure of Lord Morley from the India Office has been the occasion of unstinted and unanimous eulogy, his political opponents combining with his own side in the chorus of praise. No one has a greater admiration than I have for Lord Morley's distinguished public services, but his relations with Indian administration raise important questions of policy the consideration of which ought not to be affected by any personal element. In Lord Morley's case much allowance must certainly be made for the undoubted difficulty of the position in which he found himself on first taking charge of the policy of our Eastern Empire. The crude and drastic pursuit of efficiency which had marked Lord Curzon's régime, accompanied as it was by an overbearing and contemptuous attitude towards the natural aspirations of a highly sensitive Oriental people, made a sympathetic development of policy absolutely essential to the very existence of our Administration, and to a certain extent this fact was recognised by Lord Morley. The reforms which he initiated—or, at all events, sanctioned—embodied a departure from the traditional bureaucratic point of view, for which Lord Morley deserves all credit. Where he failed was where it was hardly possible for a man whose whole training had been of the purely literary type, embarrassed by his previous philosophical criticisms of historical matter, and absolutely ignorant of the actual conditions of Asiatic life and sentiment, to achieve success.

The two main blots on Lord Morley's career as Indian Secretary of State were his treatment of the question of the Bengal partition and his drastic use of the antiquated provisions of law in regard to deportation without any pretence of judicial inquiry. The Bengal partition, the responsibility for which even its reputed author, Lord Curzon, was so eager to disavow, might well have been, on Lord Morley's first accession to office, held in suspense till the matter had been further inquired into. Had he done this—though I admit that to do so required a certain amount of prompt courage rarely to be found in a man more accustomed to deal with words than with action—it is hardly too much to say that the difficulties which have beset the Indian Government during the last five years would have been greatly lessened, if not entirely avoided. Instead of this prompt action, Lord Morley contented himself with declaring his own personal disapprobation of the partition, while refusing to attempt any modification of that ill-omened measure. A more fatal method of dealing with an Oriental grievance can hardly be imagined. Even granting that the agitation was to a great extent based on sentimental grounds, Lord Morley, as a student of history and a critic of Carlyle, ought to have recognised the enormous part in human affairs which pure sentiment has always played. It would have been quite possible to modify the partition so as to remove the sentimental grievance, while retaining the increased efficiency which a change in the government of Bengal might well be expected to produce. But to the whole grievance Lord Morley could only oppose a blank and unideaed refusal to reopen the question.

Quite as offensive to the new spirit which is now pervading the entire Asiatic world was Lord Morley's drastic use of the ancient regulation of 1818. With Acts regulating public meetings, with Press laws, and the whole paraphernalia of repressive legislation which now exists in India, it was hardly necessary to fall back on an antiquated and crude legal sanction to an act of administration more suited to the days of Roman Imperialism under the worst of the emperors, or a modern Russian Government, than a Government supposed to be controlled by an enlightened democracy. And the result was deplorable. Necessarily dependent on police evidence, the Government—as is almost admitted now—got hold of the wrong men in very many instances, and the sight of innocent suffering is one that has always stirred the hearts of men. But the spectacle of ignorance or weakness posing as strength by irrational and spasmodic acts of violence is one to which no doubt Lord Morley's studies in history could supply him with many a parallel. This is not an occasion on which to deal with the Indian question as a whole, but when the record of Lord Morley's administration comes hereafter to be written it is probable that the verdict of history on the past five years will hardly reflect the somewhat monotonous eulogy on Lord Morley's statesmanship which is now being poured forth by contemporary journalists.

THE CHARING CROSS BANK TRUSTEESHIP.

To prevent any misconception it is necessary to point out that the meeting of depositors in the Charing Cross Bank held at the Holborn Restaurant last week was entirely unofficial, possessing no legal status or authority whatever in connection with the bankruptcy proceedings. A semi-official communication to that effect was published in two or three newspapers, but the press generally thought proper to ignore it, and in consequence many people may attach an utterly undue importance to the meeting over which Sir William Dunn, M.P., presided. In saying this I do not, of course, refer to the question of the relief fund. The failure of the bank, or, to speak quite correctly, the bankruptcy of its sole proprietor, Alfred William Carpenter, has caused widespread distress, and in a large number of cases charity may well come to the assistance of the victims. At the same time the committee ought to exercise great discrimination in the dispensation of the fund which is now being raised. Its benefits should be strictly limited to cases of the kind upon which Sir William Dunn expatiated in his appeal—the cases for the most part of the humbler class of depositors, the poor widows and the aged veterans of industry, who have been reduced to a state of destitution by this failure. Their ignorance to some extent excuses their foolishness in entrusting to this concern the savings upon which they were dependent for their maintenance. There is, however, no earthly reason why the public should be called upon to mitigate the losses of the more substantial class of depositors who were much in evidence among the eight hundred assembled at this meeting. It appears that one gentleman put no less than £70,000 into the Charing Cross Bank. Presumably he did this because he wanted his capital to produce double or treble the income which a gilt-edged investment would have given him. He is now a poorer and wiser man, but not precisely a deserving object for public compassion. I take the same view of the majority, at any rate, of the heavier losers by this failure.

It is in regard to the appointment of a trustee that the unauthorised and, from a legal point of view, irresponsible character of last week's meeting needs to be emphasised. The meeting was convened by a committee, whose formation under the chairmanship of Sir William Dunn, with the benevolent object of aiding and advising the depositors, was announced in the press immediately after the failure of the bank. My own first impression was that this committee might be of considerable service to the depositors, but I modified my opinion when I saw the lines on which it was being worked, and the air of authority which it was unwarrantably assuming. From what appeared in the newspapers from day to day it might almost have been supposed that the winding up of the bankrupt's estate was already in the hands of this self-constituted committee. The very existence of the Senior Official Receiver (Mr. E. Leadam Hough), who is the interim trustee of the estate, seemed to be overlooked. Through the press the attention of the public was concentrated on the doings of a committee got together by an M.P., whose locus standi in the case was exactly the same as that of any man in the street. Sir William Dunn's first step was to request a firm of chartered accountants, Messrs. Moore, Partridge, and Co., to act as honorary secretaries, and, whatever their own wishes may have been, the reporters have not permitted these gentlemen to hide their light under a bushel. They have been kept under a blaze of publicity all the time. "During the day the offices of Messrs. Moore, Partridge, and Co. were besieged by former clients of the Charing Cross Bank eager to fill up the forms of proof and proxy." That quotation from the Daily Mail is a specimen of many, from which the ignorant reader would never understand that there is such a place as the Bankruptcy Buildings in Carey Street, where depositors or other creditors can obtain all necessary assistance in the preparation of their proofs from the officials of a Government department. Mr. Hough has also, in view of the exceptional nature of the case, arranged with the local Official Receivers to give the same assistance to depositors in the provincial towns where the bank had branches. This fact cannot be too widely known, because not only in London, but through the agency of local secretaries throughout the country, Sir William Dunn's committee has been paraded and advertised in a style which might cause people to imagine that it is an official body through whom claims should be made and to whom proxies should be given.

Now, as the Senior Official Receiver has pointed out, this is a case in which the wise choice of a trustee is of supreme importance, for upon his standing, experience, and ability will depend to a great extent the amount to be recovered for the creditors, particularly in respect of the debtor's expenditure on the Atlantic, Quebec, and Western Railway. How was this vital question of the trusteeship dealt with at the meeting last week? First of all, twenty depositors selected by Sir William Dunn and his friends were appointed to act as a general committee, and then it was proposed that the nomination of a trustee should be left to this committee. During the discussion the names of Mr Plender, President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, and of Mr. W. B. Peat, an ex-president, were introduced, but Sir William Dunn insisted that the question of the trustee was one for the committee, an amendment to postpone a decision to the statutory meeting was squelched, and finally a resolution binding those who voted for it to support the committee's nomination was carried. The moment the full meeting had dispersed a meeting of the committee was held, and they forthwith recommended that Mr. H. J. de C. Moore, of the firm of Moore, Partridge and Co., should be the trustee in the bankruptcy, with a committee of inspection, consisting of five of their own number. It is not surprising that this proceeding has called forth some strong protests. It is certainly provocative of such caustic remarks as that of the Advisory Committee for Glasgow and West of Scotland depositors:—

> Many people wondered why Sir W. H. Dunn and his committee were taking such active steps and spending so much money in advertising; but it now appears that a partner of Messrs. Moore, Partridge, and Co. is to be run by Sir W. H. Dunn's committee for the appointment of trustee.

Without doubting that motives of the purest philanthropy animated the promoters of this Depositors' Protection Committee, one must still see that the question of the trusteeship ought to be considered solely from a business standpoint. Mr. Moore and his partners are a respectable firm of chartered accountants, against whom personally I have nothing to say. But with all respect to these gentlemen it would be idle to pretend that they are a firm whose professional standing, equipment, and experience would mark them out as the best qualified persons to deal with a bankruptcy business of this exceptional magnitude and difficulty. In such a case it is most desirable that accountants of the ripest experience and highest position should be employed, and in these qualifications Mr. Moore cannot for a moment be ranked with Mr. Plender or Mr. Peat, not to mention other well-known members of the profession. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be a mistake for the depositors to endorse the nomination put forward by the committee. The depositors are said to number about 25,000. Obviously only a very small minority will be able to attend the statutory meeting of creditors fixed by the Senior Official Receiver for the 21st instant, and if there is a vote as to the appointment of a trustee and committee of inspection the voting will mainly be by proxy. Apparently a good many depositors have already given proxies in favour of the committee, who now propose the appointment of Mr. Moore. I think they would be well advised to withdraw those proxies and to give general proxies to the Senior Official Receiver. That official occupies an entirely impartial and disinterested position in the matter, and he can be relied upon to use his proxies in the best interests of the creditors.

Estimates of the value of the bankrupt's assets must necessarily be more or less in the nature of guesswork.

I have, however, been interested to observe that some optimists put down certain mining properties in the Transvaal at £50,000, being the amount of the debtor's expenditure thereon. If this is a reference to Mr. Carpenter's rash speculation in the defunct Standerton-Ermelo Goldfields, Limited, of which an account was given in the TRUTH articles on his bank in 1907, I venture to predict that the return to his creditors from this source is not likely to be 50,000 pence. In the same articles I related how Mr. Carpenter, after sinking a large sum in some unproductive oil wells, at Gaspé, in the Province of Quebec, began to employ the funds of his so-called bank in another essentially speculative undertaking, the Atlantic, Quebec, and Western Railway, which starts from Gaspé harbour. Experts whose opinion I obtained at the time described the financial prospects of this concern as far from brilliant. Down to the present time only a short section of the line has been constructed, and those who count upon the recovery of anything more than a small proportion of the million and a quarter sterling which Mr. Carpenter has spent upon it out of the money entrusted to him by the confiding depositors are, I fear, doomed to disappointment.

WHITEWASHING THE QUACK.

As a contribution to the discussion on the increase of quackery a little volume entitled "A Sequel to 'Secret Remedies,'" sent me by the author, Mr. Frederick Phillips, has many points of interest. Though it would be hardly fair to describe the author as an apologist for the quacks, yet the volume is confessedly an attempt to present to the public the case in defence of the vendors of nostrums against the attacks of the medical profession as disclosed in "Secret Remedies." Mr. Phillips has done his best with the material at his disposal, but the net result is merely to reveal how very little there is to be said in favour of the present system of things, which allows anybody to put up in bottle or pill-box any miscellaneous assortment of drugs his fancy may dictate, and to advertise the conglomeration as a cure for any or every disease to which mankind is subject.

One very noticeable point is the shyness evinced by the majority of patent medicine vendors in availing themselves of the opportunity Mr. Phillips has given them of saying a word in their own defence. About a hundred proprietary articles were dealt with in "Secret Remedies," and the proprietors have been invited to make any statement they please regarding the analyses of their nostrums made by the British Medical Association. Only twenty-two responded, and of these the majority content themselves with the remark that the analysis was incorrect or far from being true. One exception is the Derk P. Yonkerman Company, which makes a great point of the failure of the analyst to discover ipecacuanha wine in Tuberculozyne, and makes anew the assertion that the presence of salts of copper in this specific for consumption is the basis of the theory of the cure. The value of this claim was effectually disposed of last week in TRUTH, where I pointed out that all such statements had been eliminated from the company's advertising matter in America, because their retention would bring the company within the purview of the U.S.A. Post Office fraud order. Another exception is the notorious "Dr." Kidd, of Baltimore, who supplies a list of the various ingredients contained in his various tablets, which differs very considerably from those found by the analyst. Kidd may be right and the analyst may be wrong. In his case the danger to the public lies in his undertaking the diagnosis and treatment of patients whom he has never seen without any other information than their own description of their symptoms. That is quackery of the most mischievous type, and the question as to what drugs are or are not prescribed is of minor importance.

But this contention on the part of twenty-two proprietors of secret remedies that skilled analysis is not able to reveal the component parts is a double-edged sword. What right has any man to thrust down the throats of the public blends of drugs which may or may not be innocuous, but which in any case are known only to the manufacturer? It will be urged, of course, that the owner of a formula of a pill has as much right to exercise proprietorial rights over it as the owner of a cow or a field has to enjoy undisturbed possession of his property. So long as he makes his pills for his own consumption the argument would hold good. But the public welfare must of necessity override individual rights of profit-making, and when the formula-owner, for motives of gain, undertakes to cure the public with his pills the public has the right to call upon him to submit his formula to the proof of publication. In almost every European country but England this simple right of the public to be protected against the secret remedy monger is already recognised. France insists on the official registration of the formulæ of proprietary medicines. Italy has a similar law in force. Germany forbids the advertisement of a remedy of which the constituents are not disclosed. Austria similarly protects the public against the undue pretensions of the quack, and even Switzerland insists upon the disclosure of the medicaments entering into pill or potion advertised for the cure of disease. In certain of our self-governing colonies the wisdom of similar protective measures has been seen and acted upon. But here in England there is absolutely no law to prevent any one putting a few cheap drugs into a bottle, advertising the mixture as a cure for consumption or cancer, and growing fat on the shillings or guineas of the unfortunate sufferers, who will grasp at any chance, however remote, which offers them a prospect of a restoration to health. From quackery of this type the compulsory disclosure of the ingredients would at least offer a measure of protection.

COLLECTORS AND COLLECTING.

The collector not only gathers china, furniture, books, or paintings; he also acquires a great and curious knowledge of the life of bygone days, while allowing his intellect its greatest pleasure—namely, the expression of his taste. Of collecting much has been written. Most of the literature on the subject deals quite properly with the art of achieving and the joy of possession. Of the ecstasy of the first stages in a curio hunter's career little has been said. It has been declared that chess and china are two of the chief tributaries of the great river of unhappiness which flows through the divorce courts. Some men have neglected all in favour of the pursuit of one or other of these absorbing passions. The individual who desires to collect should fulfil his wish in a Catholic spirit, or his life will become warped and his intellect will feed upon one idea alone. Fortunately but few men possess at once the industry and patience which are the equipment of the successful gatherer of a specialised collection and the leisure and fortune which are no less necessary.

Many people pass through life completely immune from the collecting habit, while to others the possession of but one bit of china which appears old and good has started them gaily rocking on the great hobby-horse of their existence. In an idle moment a figure of a fisher girl delicately posed, with deliciously moulded hands and feet, sets you wondering. The vague generalities of china occur to you; a fleeting remembrance passes through the mind of porcelain marks. The figure is picked off the mantelpiece, and turned upside down. There certainly are some cabalistic signs upon its base. A cross, a crown, and a D. The dust on your Encyclopædia is disturbed. The mark is there. Crown Derby!

An even more certain temptation to embark upon collecting would be the perusal of the genially written notes in Sir James Yoxall's "A.B.C. about Collecting" (Stanley Paul), or even the slightly more professional volume of Edward Dillon on "Porcelain and How to Collect It" (Methuen). Sir James Yoxall will probably send you hastening away to view with renewed interest and appreciation the treasures of the South Kensington and the Wallace Collection. You will, perhaps smiling at yourself, examine every bit of china you possess. You gradually acquire a little knowledge, and have the glorious thrill of being able to identify an Indian from a Persian rug, to decide definitely that the chair in Thompson's studio is Chippendale and not Sheraton. Thus you spread the contagion of collecting, for if you confide your knowledge to others in them, too, will be aroused the desire to learn. You will drop into your local antique shop. It is a curious fact that the people engaged in the antique furniture and collecting trades are the most agreeable persons imaginable. They have all the artistic appreciation of their goods which a good grocer has for his tea or sugar; and they know much more about it. A grocer knows if his sugar is beet or cane. Perhaps it comes from Havana or the West Indies. An antique dealer will know the period of a silver sauce boat; not from any date upon it, perhaps not from its shape or the style of its ornamentation, but from his ability to detect by the touch whether the marks of the hammer have been left in the finished article. The joy of it is that you can do it yourself. He is an authority on woods of various trees now quite unheard of in the furniture trade. The bulge in that cupboard is proof of the fact that it was built for the storage of bacon in the days when Chicago was undreamt of. He may tell you that a piece of china, which looks to your beginner's eye Lowestoft imitation of Chinese or Japanese ware, is a Japanese imitation of the Lowestoft counterfeit Japanese, and he will leave you marvelling at the simian nature of humanity. Another piece of Prussian porcelain he will declare to be "Jew's china," explaining with a laugh that the Prussian Government when it took up the manufacture of china determined to make a commercial success of it. So no Jew was granted a certificate of marriage unless he purchased a service of Royal Prussian china. All the products of the Prussian factory thus became known as Juden Porzellan.

Of course, china is both the most fascinating and the most dangerous object for the new enthusiast. The amount of fraud perpetrated in the various factories is stupendous, and the care with which china is forged would put a bank forger to shame. There are many charming things to collect which are both inexpensive and pleasing. The acquisition of the specimen pieces of needlework toiled over with tears and pricked fingers by the younger generation of the eighteenth century appeals particularly to women. They are able more readily to appreciate the exquisite workmanship. They smile with more understanding than a man over some little makeshift device to save time and enable the "Jane Calcott, aged seven years," of 1796 to escape from her task to the garden. Perhaps there was a bee humming, and that on a hot summer afternoon is louder than all the bugle-calls of spring.

The sentiment of all collecting is mellow. Age has robbed colours of their virulence, wood of its aggressive youth, metal of its brilliance, and over all the laughing and loving which were life yesterday as they are to-day, Time has thrown a gentle, golden enchantment, which enables us to speculate with tenderness on the bepowdered beauties of the Courts of the Louis without applying to their dallyings in the broad umbrageous avenues of Versailles the rigid moral codes of the present; or to feel a glow of admiration for the rude-lipped who has given his name to the prodigious family of broad-beamed jugs which go by the name of Tobies, without passing mental strictures on the decidedly intemperate habits of a century ago.

Guided by taste and kept within the bounds of discriminate moderation, a collector will find and furnish his home with a store of personal possessions, each one of which will recall a pleasant rummage in a lumber room, an idle half-hour loitering on the Paris Quais or outside Charing Cross Road book-shops—moments of pleasure and of expectation which may well repay him or his descendants, should the time ever come to disperse the treasures again for the gratification of another generation of collectors.

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

III.—THE TRUST AND THE RAILROADS

The "Terminal Facilities" Weapon.

A NOTEWORTHY development of the conspiracy between the Standard Oil Company and the railroads was what became known as Standard control of the railroad "terminal facilities." By terminal facilities is understood the unloading, storing, and handling of oil at the railroad termini, chiefly in the vicinity of New York harbour. By the transmission of manifests and waybills the railroads, as already shown, gave the Standard people an unfair knowledge of their competitors' business, but in the affair of the terminals they went even further. They handed over the entire control and management of their oil yards and wharves to this one favoured oil company, authorising it to collect the oil-yard charges from its rivals, and to handle its rivals' oil consignments according to its own goodwill and pleasure. Fancy one of our British railway companies putting all its railway sidings in London under the control of a single firm of Newcastle coal merchants, and allowing this firm to load or unload, forward or delay the consignment of rival firms according to its own convenience or good pleasure! Fancy the outcry that would be raised against this privileged firm when it became known that the only check upon its dealing unjustly with its rivals was that, whatever charges it elected to make for loading, unloading, and storage at the railway company's sidings, such charges were to be uniform in all cases! This last proviso was a mere mockery. The only authority appointed to see that no advantage was given to one competitor over another was the arch-competitor—the Standard Oil Company. The companies entering into this special conspiracy were the Erie, the New York Central and Hudson River, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Pennsylvania railroads at the Atlantic seaboard. I have before me as I write copies of the contracts made by all these railroads, excepting the Pennsylvania, with the Standard Oil Company, and they make astounding reading.

Something Best Forgotten.

This matter of the "terminal facilities" very naturally received attention in the late U.S. Government prosecution of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, tried in the State of Missouri, when the Court found that the company was identical with the Standard Oil Trust, which had previously been ordered by the Court to be dissolved as an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade. The effect of the decision has been suspended by an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which would have been decided last spring had it not been for the death of Judge Brewer, the presiding judge. The appeal is expected to be decided under his tardily appointed successor, Judge Hughes, next spring or early summer. In the meantime, the finding of the Missouri Circuit Court, before which the case was argued, is that of "Guilty." When Mr. Rockefeller had, with the greatest difficulty, been haled before this court and asked to explain these contracts on oath, all he could urge in his favour was that "the Standard interests were handling very large quantities of oil, and were the natural parties to have control of the warehousing, receiving, and shipping of oil." Cross-examination could extract very little from him. He could not even say when the Standard Oil interests got possession of the terminals nor how long they retained them. He admitted that the Standard levied terminal charges on the oil of independents, but did not know the amount. He relapsed, in short, into that painfully afflicting condition of amnesia which seems to be constitutional with Standard Oil officials when subjected to the rude shock of public examination.

Aids to Standard Oil Memory.

But, luckily, the written letter of the contracts is now to hand to supplement this lamentable want of memory. Take, for instance, that with the Erie Company dated April 17, 1874, in Section 7 of which the Standard agrees to pay 5 cents a barrel to the Erie Railroad for the use of its yards, and further agrees "to make the charges uniform to all parties who use the yards or for whom services are performed therein, and always as low as any other oil yard, affording proper facilities for the transfer, storage, preparation, and shipment of the oil at any terminus of any railway or other line competing with the Erie Railway at or adjacent to the port of New York." There is something like humour in the phrase "as low as any other oil yard." Every "other oil yard" was similarly controlled by the Standard. One of its directors, Mr. Jabez A. Bostwick, stated on oath before the Hepburn Committee on October 16, 1879, that the Standard at that time controlled the terminals of the Erie and the New York Central railroads, and that the New York Central had no other oil terminals at New York Harbour except those controlled by the Standard. At the time he was testifying he had charge of the New York Central yards, and declined to answer as to his relation with the Standard Oil Company in that connection. The usual atmosphere of mystery! It is dissipated, however, at the present date, for we have now the text of the contract between the New York Central and the Standard before us, signed January 1, 1876, and referring to a previous contract of July 22, 1875.

The Claim to Superiority.

One more point and I have done with the "terminal facilities." Section 8 of the Erie contract provides that the Standard Oil Company shall assume the collection of freights and charges on all oil received at the yard and render accounts weekly. "This provision," observes the "Brief for the United States," given to the Attorney-General in the Missouri case now awaiting the decision of the Supreme Court, "gave the Standard Company the power to collect the Erie's freight charges for transportation of competitors' oil, thereby giving the Standard the great advantage of knowledge of all competitive shipments and of the rates of freight, and enabling it to compel those parties to pay the full rate, while the Standard could obtain any rate it might arrange for with the railroad companies, and it will be shown that the Standard had rebates from all of them." In the light of all this, what becomes of the Standard Oil claim to superior business acumen and cleverness? Under the conditions shown, a mere schoolboy could outstrip and ruin the most seasoned merchant in the race for commercial success. The claim to superior business methods is an absolutely unfounded one, and might as well be urged by a burglar who can make a fortune in a night; but, then, his avocation is not usually referred to as "business."

Railroads Boycott Standard Rivals.

By this time the pumping of crude oil from the wells through pipe lines had commenced, first for short distances to collecting points on the railroads, but later for long distances, completely superseding the railroads. The Standard's pipe lines, called the United Pipe Lines, were under the management of the late Mr. Daniel O'Day, the big Irishman I mentioned in my first article. At first, the railroads and Standard pipe lines worked together to harass and delay the "independent" shipper and refiner. Here is evidence of how the Standard Oil Company's secret agreements with the railroads made it the interest of the latter to decrease the shipments of independent oil by refusing to furnish adequate cars and by delaying delivery. In 1878 Mr. W. H. Nicholson, the representative of Mr. Ohlen, a New York shipper of petroleum, appeared before an investigation ordered by the Secretary of Internal Affairs of the State of Pennsylvania, and gave evidence upon oath that he began to have a difficulty in getting cars in May of that year. One day, he stated, Mr. Ohlen telegraphed to the officials of the Erie road to know if he could get 100 cars to run east. The reply came back: "Yes." About noon Mr. Nicholson saw Mr. O'Day, the manager of the United Pipe Lines (Standard Oil property), in which his oil was stored, and told him he was waiting to have his cars loaded. Mr. O'Day at once said he could not load the cars. "But I have an order from the Erie officials giving me the cars," Mr. Nicholson objected. "That makes no difference," O'Day replied; "I cannot load cars except upon an order from Pratt." Nor would he do it. The cars were not loaded for Mr. Nicholson, though at the time he had 10,000 barrels of oil in the United Pipe Lines and an order for 100 cars from the officials of the Erie in his hand. "Pratt," of course, was the late Mr. Charles Pratt, whose refinery was at this time merged in the Standard combine, and whose name is memorialised in this country by the well-known "Pratt's motor spirit."

High-handed proceedings of this sort by the Pennsylvania Railroad gradually created such a hubbub that the State of Pennsylvania instituted a suit against it. This is the evidence given by Mr. B. B. Campbell, President of the Producers' Union, on the occasion:—

> I never heard of a scarcity of cars until the early part of June, 1878. I came to Parker (a town in Pennsylvania) about five o'clock in the evening, and found the citizens in a state of terrible excitement. The Pipe-Lines would not run oil unless it was sold; the only shippers we had in Parker of any amount, viz., the agents of the Standard Oil Company, would not buy oil, stating that they could not get cars; hundreds of wells were stopped to their great injury; thousands more, whose owners were afraid to stop them for fear of damage by salt water, were pumping the oil on the ground. . . . On Saturday morning I spoke very plainly to Mr. Shinn (Vice-President of the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company, controlled by the

NICE, CIMIEZ.—WINTER PALACE.—Most up-to-date. Beautiful gardens. High-class chamber music. Tennis courts free. Motor-car service to town.—JOS. AGID.

Pennsylvania), telling him that the idea of a scarcity of cars on daily shipments of less than 30,000 barrels a day was such an absurd, barefaced pretence that he could not expect men of ordinary intelligence to accept it, as the preceding fall (anglice, autumn), when business required, the railroads could carry day after day from 50,000 to 60,000 barrels of oil. . . . I requested him to be the vehicle of communicating to the Pennsylvania Railroad officials my views on the subject, telling him that I was convinced that, unless immediate relief was furnished and cars afforded, there would be an outbreak in the Oil Regions. . . . On the next Monday I returned to Parker. After passing Redbank, where the low-grade road, the connecting link between the Valley Road and the Philadelphia and Erie Road, meets the Valley Road—between that point and Parker—the express train was delayed for over half-an-hour in passing through hundreds of empty oil cars!"

Early History of the Trust.

The affair of the pipe-lines is so much mixed up with that of the secret railway rebates and the misdoings of the railways in the matter of refusing and delaying transport that I must here sketch it out briefly. In August, 1872, Mr. Rockefeller, as the result of much plotting and planning, succeeded in persuading about four-fifths of the refining interest in the United States to go into a National Refiners' Association, with himself as president, the object being to checkmate the Petroleum Producers' Union, which had just exposed the South Improvement Company. This refiners' association was to operate on what was known as the "Pittsburg Plan"—so called from the place where the scheme was first organised—according to which all the refineries were subject to a central board. They were to refine only such an amount as the board allowed, not to undersell prices fixed by the board, and to leave their buying of crude oil and the arrangements for transportation entirely in the hands of the board. In the aggregate they would thus form a company, presided over by one central board, their participation in this company would be expressed in terms of stock, and each stockholder would receive dividends whether his plant operated or not. It was, in short, a "Trust," with Mr. Rockefeller as trustee. The refiners had put their heads into the lion's mouth with a vengeance.

The Petroleum Producers' Union was up in arms at once to protect the price of crude, and made an heroic effort to do so by restricting output. They also set up a producers' selling agency to cut out the Refiners' Association by refusing to sell it oil except at their own price. They were no match in generalship, however, for Mr. Rockefeller, especially when aided, as he was, by the hand of Nature. Nature was unkind enough to send the producers gushers and floods of oil when they wanted it least, and they found restriction of output practically impossible. At the same time most of the producers were badly in want of ready cash, and the Refiners' Association had the longer purse.

Mr. Rockefeller's "Slimness."

At the psychological moment Mr. Rockefeller struck the judicious blow of offering to throw in his lot with the producers and buy crude only from the Producers' Selling Agency (and that at $4.75 a barrel, a clear dollar over the then current market price), if the producers on their part would undertake to maintain the price and sell to no one outside the Refiners' Association. The coup succeeded, and, half tempted, half constrained by cash necessities, the producers were ill-advised enough to trust their enemy and sign what was known as "The Treaty of Titusville" on the lines proposed. They at once received an order from Mr. Rockefeller for 200,000 barrels of crude at $3.25, not quite as good a price as that first mentioned, but which, under the circumstances, they were glad to accept. The "treaty" was signed on December 19, 1872. The producers had shipped about 50,000 of the barrels ordered by Mr. Rockefeller, when, on January 14, 1873, they were suddenly electrified to hear that that gentleman refused to take any more of the contract oil!

When taken to task Mr. Rockefeller urged in his defence the pitiful plea that the producers had not kept their part of the contract by limiting the supply of oil. It was true that the Producers' Union was pledged by its own internal organisation to limit the supply of crude, but no such stipulation appeared in the contract signed by it with the Refiners' Association. It was its own domestic arrangement. Had the matter been taken to court it is difficult to see how an alleged verbal understanding could have prevailed against a written contract. But no such step was taken. The Producers' Union collapsed in utter demoralisation, and never made another united effort for the next five years. The Refiners' Association also found itself unable to keep up the internal discipline it had imposed upon itself. It dissolved in June, 1873, and Mr. Rockefeller was left sole master of the situation. He had out-generalled everybody.

Discrimination or "Equalisation"?

In 1874 the Erie, Central, and Pennsylvania Railroads entered into a combination with certain of the pipe-lines, to the effect that equal rates should be charged by both the railroads and the pipe-lines in the combination. The railroads were to starve out the independent pipe-lines by refusing them the advantages given to the United Pipe-Lines. Both railway freights and pipage rates were to be raised simultaneously, and on such a schedule that henceforth the cost of transport would be equal to all refiners, on crude and refined, from all points! This combination was announced curtly by a private circular sent out by James H. Rutter, freight agent of the New York Central, containing the paragraph:—

"You will observe that under this system the rate is even and fair to all parties, preventing one locality taking advantage of its neighbour by reason of some alleged or real facility it may possess. Oil refiners and shippers have asked the roads from time to time to make all rates even, and they would be satisfied. This scheme does it, and we trust will work satisfactorily to all."

The refiners and shippers referred to as complacently as if they formed the bulk of the refining and shipping interest were, of course, Mr. Rockefeller and his friends, assumed for the nonce, as in the case of the South Improvement Company, to be "the trade."

The above astounding circular, commonly referred to in American trust history as the Rutter circular, introduces us to the second species of unjust discrimination enjoyed by Mr. Rockefeller, and perhaps—of late years, at any rate—with an even more disastrous effect than that of the secret rebate—namely, the "discriminatory rate." In some cases the discriminatory rate was secret, in others published. The Rutter circular projected the idea into a sort of quasi-publicity as an ostensibly fair one. The brief for the Government in the pending appeal by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey against the Missouri judgment characterises these discriminatory rates as follows:—

The testimony in this case will show that in the open published rates, as well as in secret and unfiled rates, there was radical discrimination against the independent shipping points and in favour of the Standard shipping points. . . . It is impossible that without connivance with the Standard Oil Company the railroads of this country should have uniformly made a system of rates whereby with scarcely an exception the independent shipping points were discriminated against in favour of the Standard shipping points. . . . It is a well-known fact that this group of defendants is the most influential in financial circles in the United States. This influence has undoubtedly been used to obtain these preferential rates, because it could not be possible that it merely happened in the ordinary course of business that practically every Standard shipping point would be favoured with advantageous rates as against competitors.

This contention has, of course, been already sustained by the finding of the Missouri Circuit Court, as it is sustained by the common sense of any one who takes the trouble to go through the schedules of rate charges made by the railroads recently brought to light. The Standard Oil Company's main refinery is at Whiting, in Indiana, a trifle to the south-east of Chicago. To take a few instances, the rate from Whiting to Chattanooga, a distance of 849 miles, by the route actually used on the road, was fixed by the railroad at 25.9 cents per hundred gallons, while the rate from Pittsburg—an independent refining centre—to Chattanooga, a distance of only 651 miles, was as much as 47 cents per hundred. In other words, the Standard Oil Company paid 21 cents a hundred less for shipping 200 miles further. This difference amounts to over 1¼ cents per gallon, which is in itself a large profit on oil. The discrimination against Cleveland and Toledo—two other independent shipping centres—on shipments to Chattanooga was equally great. Again, take the destination of Birmingham, in the State of Alabama. The open rate from Pittsburg, a distance of 794 miles, was 51.5 cents.; from Whiting, a distance of 820 miles, it was 29.5 cents, a difference of 22 cents. Similarly, there was an equal discrimination against Cleveland and Toledo on shipments to Birmingham. And so on to the end of the chapter of conspiracy all over the States.

The Foundation of the Trust.

The arrangements which have now been described were the foundation on which the Standard Oil monopoly was built. Some time in the summer of 1874, when he had become sure that the so-called "equalisation" scheme would be worked in his favour by the railroads and leading pipe-lines simultaneously, Mr. Rockefeller conferred at Saratoga with two of his old friends of the South Improvement Company—W. G. Warden, of Philadelphia, and Charles Lockhart, of Pittsburg—both big refiners, and agreed with them to form an oil refiners' trust, which was to work with absolute secrecy, and gradually acquire control of all the refineries in America. The instrument by which this large order was to be put through was, of course, the secret rebate and the new "equalisation," or, less euphemistically, discrimination. Secrecy was to be maintained by each firm as it came in carrying on business ostensibly as before under its old style and title, staff, and management, but its actual business was to be directed solely by the central board of the trust, presided over by Mr. Rockefeller, which would control all operations of buying, transport, and selling. The refineries had to become the absolute property, however, of the Standard Oil Company, their late proprietors taking stock of that company in exchange. We know this from an account of the Saratoga meeting given at a later period by Charles Lockhart, of Pittsburg, to Miss Ida M. Tarbell.

How it Persuaded its Rivals.

In March, 1875, something leaked out as to the constitution of the Trust, which was then spoken of as the Central Association. It gradually roped in most of the refining firms in America, the process being effected by one sensational collapse after another under the influence of the discrimination and the rebate. An exception was the huge refinery of Charles Pratt and Co., of New York, of which the famous H. H. Rogers was one of the most considerable assets. This firm sold itself more or less voluntarily to the Standard Oil for stock at 265. The débâcle of the "Creek" refineries, i.e., those in the Oil Regions, was conducted by the scarcely less famous J. D. Archbold, who appeared in Titusville as the representative of a Standard Oil offshoot, since known to fame as the Acme Oil Company. Between 1875 and 1879 Mr. Archbold won his spurs in the Standard by buying out, dismantling, or shutting down nearly every refinery on the "Creek." The history of this collapse makes pitiful reading, and I need not enter into it beyond giving a specimen or two extracted from contemporary records. In 1888 Mr. A. H. Tack, a partner of the Citizens' Oil Refining Company of Pittsburg, after explaining on oath before the House Committee on Manufactures how his splendidly organised business gradually became non-paying under the Standard Oil influence, added:—

> In 1874 I went to see Rockefeller if we could make arrangements with him by which we could run a portion of our works. It was a very brief interview. He said there was no hope for us all. He remarked this—I cannot give the exact quotation—"There is no hope for us," and probably he said, "There is no hope for any of us"; but he says, "The weakest must go first." And we went!

The case of Scofield, Shurmer and Teagle, a Cleveland refinery, is shocking evidence of the demoralisation of the times. At first the firm showed fight, and in 1876 brought a suit against the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern and the New York Central and Hudson River railroads for "unlawful and unjust discrimination, partialities, and preferences made and practised . . . in favour of the Standard Oil Company, enabling the said Standard Oil Company to obtain, to a great extent, the monopoly of the oil and naphtha trade of Cleveland." But Mr. Rockefeller persuaded them to drop their suit and obtain bigger profits than they were making by becoming his fellow-conspirators. They signed a contract, consequently, with him for ten years, the firm putting in a plant worth $73,000 and its entire time, and Mr. Rockefeller putting in $10,000—and his railway discriminations! The firm was guaranteed $35,000 a year net profit—about 50 per cent. on capital; profits over $35,000 went to Mr. Rockefeller up to $70,000—about 100 per cent.; any further profits were to be divided.

"It was the Bold Turpin!"

The enormous dimensions of the profits contemplated in this case—and no doubt afterwards reaped—would presumably have excited suspicion very quickly among Scofield, Shurmer and Teagle's acquaintances who had seen them in their struggling days had not Mr. Rockefeller been an adept in joining secrecy to fraud as the basis of his operations. To quote Miss Tarbell (I., p. 66):—

> According to the testimony of one of the firm given a few years later on the witness-stand in Cleveland the contract was signed at night at Mr. Rockefeller's house on Euclid Avenue in Cleveland, where he told the gentlemen that they must not even tell their wives about the new arrangement, that if they made money they must conceal it—they were not to drive fast horses, "put on style," or do anything to let people suspect there were unusual profits in oil refining. That would invite competition. They were told that all accounts were to be kept secret. Fictitious names were to be used in corresponding, and a special box at the post-office was employed for these fictitious characters. In fact, smugglers and house-breakers never surrounded their operations with more mystery.

"Smuggling," "housebreaking," "burglary" are all terms that have been used to designate Mr. Rockefeller's methods, though much has been made of his mild demeanour and gentle persuasiveness in dealing with his rivals. To my mind his persuasiveness is on a par with that of the bold highwayman sung of in the "Pickwick Papers":—

> But Dick put a couple of balls in his nob
> And perwailed on him to stop.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

BRIAND AS RICHARD III.

THOUGH Waldeck Rousseau, who was singularly sensitive to psychical idiosyncrasies, thought he detected "something of a Richard III. in the editor of La Lanterne" ten years ago, I never thought Briand as black as Jaurès paints him. The short turn he took on the Socialists, after preaching to them for six years—in season and out, in the heat of political meetings and in the cold blood of lectures—a general strike of railways, does remind one of Richard III. There is also an analogy between his mode of dealing with Viviani and that of Richard in chucking out Hastings and Buckingham, to consign them to the headsman. I think, however, his great defect, as times go, is not in his alleged Machiavellism. It is rather, perhaps, in a pliability of character, a want of firm purpose when self-advancement is not in view, an absence of well-braced nerves. But this want is less great than what is generally believed, at the Chamber. One may think what one pleases of his mobilisation of the railway servants against themselves—and I incline to think it highly dangerous and likely to lead to evils far worse than those he overcame—but it cannot be said that in this instance he lacked decision.

It was remarked to Waldeck Rousseau when he discovered the something that reminded him of Richard III. that M. Briand is of a rare amiability of disposition. He dreads giving pain to any one with whom he is on good terms, and is tender-hearted and affectionate in his family life. His former neighbours at Nantes still speak of his devotion to his mother and sister before and after his upward bound in political life. To this Waldeck Rousseau objected that "Richard III. lived in a time of ferocious cruelty, dissimulation, greed, and ruffianism. Not to be a victim, one had to victimise remorselessly. Margaret and Suffolk were not only no better than Richard, but not nearly so good. He caused his youthful nephews to be murdered; but Margaret had on her soul the horrible murder of Rutland and the ferocious execution of the Duke of York. Had there not been something almost phenomenally sweet hidden away in Richard's nature he could not have talked round women as he pleased. He must have had something Orpheonic in his voice. So has the young editor of La Lanterne." This opinion was expressed when Briand, in ardently promoting a general railway strike, had seemingly compromised the success of the 1900 Exhibition. All that was combative in him had been called out by the sight of his fellow Socialist Millerand (and still at the time his comrade) with a Ministerial portfolio under his arm and the lordship of the then coming exhibition assigned him.

Richard III. may, up to a certain point, have wanted to please every one, been aware that he had the gift of seduction, in spite of his deformity, and found pleasure in exercising it. This encouraged persons about him to trespass on what they took for facility, and led to his taking short and ferocious turns on them. Deputies without number accuse the Premier of trying to govern as a despot by cajolery, and when it does not suit turning round sharp to show a harsh face. He is naturally civil (rather than polite) and obliging, and those soft eyes of his enhance the effect of the dulcet voice as he renders some service, great and small. In saying so much good of him, I admit that there is a striking analogy in his terrible indictment of the railway servants who struck to escape from semi-starvation, and Richard III.'s attack in the opening act of Shakespeare's tragedy on the Queen and her kindred. Of course, one has to look up his speeches, lectures, and leaders in La Lanterne, delivered and written before 1903. He entered the Chamber as the elect of a red-hot Socialist constituency in 1902.

The Cabinet crisis of last week had some novel features. They surprise some; they give offence to others. The latter abuse Fallières. Are they right? Are they wrong? Whom else could he ask to form a new Ministry, except Briand. Briand had in his portfolio the resignations of all the colleagues in whose company he had faced the terrible hailstorm of interpellation on the memorable Sunday in which Jaurès was so Olympian and flung down thunderbolts, but failed to overthrow the Prime Minister at whom he aimed them. This being so, the President could not send for any leader of the Two Hundred who fell into a bloc in the course of their furious and very personal attack. There were too many Righters in the other groups of the minority for the President to negotiate with their accidental leaders. And then, as M. Pichon had been saying, there were some sharp angles in foreign affairs, and no doubt the Russian ally would be glad if the man who brought the State safely, without bloodshed, through the strike came back again.

The President found himself on the horns of a rather puzzling and queer dilemma. What made it so puzzling was that M. Briand had not resigned. He therefore was free to remain. And he apparently meant to do so after drawing that laudative certificate from M. Viviani. He wanted to slough a skin that ill-fitted him in his fresh evolution, and so form a new and more distinctly Radical majority. He also wanted to surround himself with Ministers who could not think themselves men of mark, though they had been useful workers to him in Committees of the Chamber and the Senate.

Those whom he intended to bring into the remodelled Cabinet would confine themselves strictly to administrative work, each in his own Department, leaving him as the Napoleon of the Government to deal as he pleased with political questions of a wide or national bearing.

Those who were close to him in the Chamber said that not a sign of emotion appeared in him. He passed on unmoved when a few score of fists were shaken in his face and a push forward made as if to bring him to bay. On his way out he fell in with M. Pichon, who showed great concern. They both went in M. Briand's closed motor to his Ministry. There a clerk brought the Premier the proofs of his speech. As he corrected, Deputies Raynaud (who had been his warm defender in the tribune), Etienne, and Dujardin Beaumetz, all three anxious to be on his list for portfolios, came in. When the proofs had been revised, all chatted, the visitors with passion.

Pichon, as a sub-editor of La Justice, had been to the banquet at Belleville at which twenty-eight years ago a terrible storm burst on Gambetta. The great orator was violently execrated as a would-be Dictator. He retorted by calling those who did so vile, drunken slaves, and threatening to root them out of their dens. M. Pichon had never since seen such a storm until the one through which the Prime Minister had just passed. Raynaud, Dujardin Beaumetz, and Etienne were wrong in seeking to justify Briand's declaration that he would not have hesitated to try illegal means against the cheminots had others failed. They spoke of it as the pure tradition of the Revolution. There is nothing more immoral than to suppose some extreme case, that may never occur, and then seeking to justify it—such as anthopophagy in an open boat in mid-ocean, or the assassination of Holofernes by Judith. There were ample means for putting down the strike of the railway servants, and they had been prepared some time before. What is more, the companies, in view of the great wish of the Government to be agreeable to the Northern, had desired the strike, and knew that they would run no risk in refusing the terms proposed by their servants. M. Briand, abandoning his position in the tribune, now confounded his supporters by saying that his words had been misunderstood, and that nothing was farther from his thoughts than to preach illegal action, which he detested. Nevertheless, he gave to two out of the three all they wanted, and Raynaud, formerly a practising avoué in a small town in the Deux Sèvres, had the honour next day to give his arm to Mme. Fallières at the flower and fruit show. He was radiant with pride and pleasure. The Ministry of Agriculture gave him the right to take round Madame la Présidente.

While the old skin was being sloughed and the new one coming out with a fresh gloss, the President risked health in going to shoot at Marly with Baron von Schoen, the new German Ambassador, and two other diplomats of his rank, M. Pichon and Admiral Caillard. M. Pichon was on this occasion, the weather being wretched, the martyr to his function. He had been miserable through the strike crisis, and dreaded the effect which the probable defeat of Briand, as it then appeared, might have on Russian Court opinion. It was Viviani's certificate of the Prime Minister's impeccability that saved him, inasmuch as it stamped Jaurès as a liar, though that great orator had been telling the truth. M. Pichon has never recovered from the effects of long service in the tropics and of the emotions he underwent during the Boxers' rising ten years ago in Peking.

Baron von Schoen arrived in the midst of the strike crisis and delivered his credentials as the battle began. He fortunately knows France well enough to know that a very bad time never lasts long in France. He is too little of the prig not to know that a certain turbulence in the French character is but the wrong side of an almost too great love of order. He produces a favourable impression. He belongs to a highly successful manufacturing family in the Rhineland, is connected with Belgium by his marriage with the daughter of a diplomatic confrère, Baron de Groote, and has already served in France. One so often sees at Foreign Office soirées faces void of all expression. They might be persons whose souls broke down in the pursuit of the decorations they wear. What animus remains is not more than enough to keep the body alive. Baron von Schoen is nothing of this. He has a remarkably honest pair of eyes, an upright demeanour, and a straightforward promptness of manner. It is the manner of a trustworthy intelligent agent and man of action. The type is German. One sees in it native homeliness, friendliness, as they understand the word in Germany, with good form.

The flower and fruit show had a struggle against dismal weather, quite phenomenal in Saint Martin's summer. It is the last we shall see in the Cours de la Reine conservatories. They are doomed to disappear before the engineers appointed to preserve Paris from future risings of the Seine. Under the great white velum that replaced the absent glass roofs, the gardeners exhibited the treasures of their parterres, hot-houses, and nurseries. As one entered the odour of fruit fell on the nostrils. Pale green Coalville apples, yellow Brie, Comte Roberts, red-cheeked ones for table ornament, brownish pippins, and pears giving delightful promise to the gourmet, lay on mossy beds. One walked between trellises to which clung muscatel, chasselas, and other vines laden heavily with purple and pale green grapes. Then the visitor reached the section devoted to the chrysanthemum. One saw there tiny flowers hardly larger than that of the London Pride and exquisite in their almost microscopic daintiness; blossoms whose long petals stood on an end like the hair of a frightened or irritated lunatic, and others that looked ready to faint away or to languish for want of healthy excitement. "Le Feu du Soir," on the contrary, seemed to triumph in its brilliant colours. It was the fire of a Norse seascape in a long summer night. The "Polyphemus," in its solar brightness, had endless admirers, and contrasted finely with the snowy white of "La Banquise," or iceberg. The latter, we were told, represented, in its strange frosted effects, immaculate purity, but fell short in ideal beauty of "Clair de Lune." The Japs showed some novelties in flowers no larger than Michaelmas daisies, but set so closely together as to form balls. The novelty lay in the petals, sometimes bristles merely, sometimes soft, curly hair, sometimes resembling those lapdogs whose silky locks fall far over their eyes. Others had petals exactly like lances ready for use in some fairyland. There were chrysanthemums to express whole gamuts of sensations, sentiments, passions, good and evil; and even the misery of pauperism had its exponent blossoms. From them one passes to the tropical room of the abnormal and morbid orchids. The orchid is to the plant world what the mocking bird is to the feathered. It mimics in its shapes butterflies, moths, beetles, creeping things, birds, and, in short, the different creatures it blooms among in the tropical forest. A border of amethyst cyclamens and a collection of novel carnations called forth cries of admiration. The Carola carnation, with its immense petals of deep dark crimson, deserves to be called the floral omniarch. It triumphs in its robust magnificence, and seems quietly to defy competition.

Chefs went about to secure the monster vegetables—leeks, turnips, carrots, root-celery, and savoy and other cabbages, including the huge chou chinois. It seems to make its way in the kitchens of great houses. The phenomenal leeks are better for the cook's purposes than the huge carrots and turnips, which are so often hollow at the hearts and lack in delicacy to the refined palate.

The Archduke Francis Ferdinand is no lover of the King of Bulgaria. They both crossed to England by the same tide to attend King Edward's funeral. When on the deck of the steamer sent to fetch them and other august and illustrious personages, the Archduke, instead of looking another way, jumped, at the risk of his life, into the steamer for ordinary passengers which lay alongside. He managed to come back in the same steamer. I am afraid the King of Bulgaria has to draw France well to the Balkanic side before using the Archduke as a bogey, or, as they say here, a réactioniste à tout crins, who can never be the friend of a godless Republic. His reactionism is supposed to find admirers at St. Petersburg. This may account for the speed with which M. Fallières terminated the Cabinet crisis, and for the astonishing attitude of M. Briand as saviour of society by means of the strong fist. The interview between him and the President when he brought the former the resignations of his nine colleagues only lasted seven minutes.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THERE are more misers, dear Lady Betty, than those who hoard cash; the Peers hoard power, much of which was accumulated by nefarious means in times of oppression. The free circulation of power and opportunities is as necessary for the prosperity of the community as is the free circulation of money.

All "rights" and privileges the Peers possess beyond those enjoyed by the community generally are merely the trappings of feudalism, and are, therefore, intolerable in modern conditions.

The Tories urgently appeal to the Liberal Unionists for help in the present emergency. The situation accurately resembles that recorded of Foote and his mother.

The latter once wrote to the former:—

"Dear Sam, I am in prison for debt; come and help your loving mother."

To which Foote answered:—

"Dear mother, so am I; your loving son."

It is difficult to decide which is the more discredited, the Tories or the Liberal Unionists, and both are revising their principles to accord them with the requirements of the public.

The Dowager Lady ——, who flourished towards the end of the eighteenth century, was a notorious kleptomaniac. At an entertainment in Berkeley Square her ladyship was examining some watches which were heirlooms in the family of the host. "I tremble," whispered another guest, "to see those treasures in Lady ——'s hands." The Radicals now tremble to see the Tories approaching Home Rule and other Liberal proposals; they will all be appropriated.

The young men in England are all for development; the old women for Dreadnoughts. In the coaching days an elderly couple were travelling in a post-chaise. "I hope the breeching is all right and tight," casually remarked the husband. The terrified woman promptly opened the window and called out, "Post-boy, post-boy, are your breeches tight?" The timid have as ridiculously misunderstood the views expressed by Tory leaders on the condition of the Navy.

A distinguished correspondent has addressed the following letter to the present writer in connection with the suggested Cabinet of Suffragettes which the latter published in these columns last week:—

"Sir,—You have been forestalled in your dream as to a woman government by no less a person than Dr. Johnson. Mrs. Piozzi relates in one of her letters that the Streatham coterie, having become weary of what they called 'male-administration,' appealed to the sage for a female Cabinet.

"'Well,' said Johnson, 'We will have Carter for Archbishop of Canterbury; Montague, First Lord of the Treasury; Hon. Sophia Byron, head of the Admiralty; Heralds Office under the care of Miss Owen; Manager of the House of Commons, Miss Crewe; Lord Chancellor, Mrs. Wedderburn; Attorney-General, Mrs. Wallace; Preceptor to the Princes, Mrs. Chapone; Poet Laureate, Hannah More.'

"'And no place for me?' said Mrs. Piozzi.

"'No, no,' said Johnson, 'you will get into Parliament by your own little silver tongue, and then rise by your merits.'

"'And what shall I do?' exclaimed Fanny Burney.

"'Oh, we will send you out for a spy, and perhaps you will get hanged!'

"I will only ask you to dream again and reveal to us whether all, or any, of your selection will merit the fate of Miss Burney.—X."

CORRESPONDENCE.

"WESTERN MEN AND EASTERN MORALS."

SIR,—I should like very much, as a white woman with many years' experience in the East, to say one or two things. It's rather hard on the English-bred woman to accuse her of frivolity and extravagance, and then make this the excuse for men's immorality and all its results.

I quite agree with your correspondent from Burma that when a man contemplates marriage in the East the expenses involved are sufficient to make him tremble. The amount required to make it possible for a man to marry, and be at the same time free from the worries of making ends meet, is appalling; but I say with all open-mindedness these expenses are not caused through the white woman's frivolity and extravagance. Men themselves are entirely to blame for this state of things. Take, for instance, a bachelor in Singapore—or any place in the S.S. or F.M.S.—on a salary of anything from 300 dols. He joins a "chummery" and engages his own personal servant. This servant will demand an exorbitant wage which is granted without question, and this individual will remain just so long as "master" keeps his eyes closed to the squeeze that is being put on him in everything. The cooks in these "chummeries" get probably 75 dols. or more per head to run the mess, and out of this they will make a clear profit of half this amount for themselves. So long as they are run fairly well a bachelor won't trouble in the least to find out whether he is paying fair prices or not. They pay their servants anything they like to ask, and allow themselves to be cheated wholesale.

Year by year food, house rent, everything becomes dearer, and this is mainly the fault of the many well-to-do bachelors who, rather than have worry or be bothered with household details, will pay anything that is asked. The result is that when a man marries—let him choose the most level-headed and sensible girl in the world—if his wife attempts to keep down expenses and try to pay market prices for food and stores generally, her life will not be worth living. She will have to put up with insolent untrained coolies for servants, she will be boycotted, and her home become a misery to herself and her husband.

Twelve years ago it was possible to get a good head boy for 10 dols., but the bachelors, in order to be served well, paid 12 dols. until this price became general, and servants refused to go out under this sum. To-day it is difficult to get a good boy under 20 dols., and in the native States men pay as much as 35 dols. and 45 dols. Naturally these natives won't come down in their prices to accommodate a man who wishes to get married, so that marriage becomes quite beyond the pocket of the ordinary low-paid assistants, whether they be planters in the jungle or clerks in mercantile offices or banks in the larger towns.

I have known many nice women eager and willing to cut down expenses and live within reasonable means, and only too desirous of saving their husbands from heavy expenses, but those who do have a bad time.

It is not women's frivolities and extravagances that makes the East too expensive for men to marry them; it is men's own desire for luxury and comfort, without care or worry. Women in the East are more ready and willing to meet inconveniences than men, though at the same time they are quite capable of joining in such pleasures and frivolities as may happen to be going on around them. There are many women leading lonely and almost solitary lives with their husbands in the jungle who have many hardships, who think nothing of it, and are quite content to get home perhaps only once every two or three years. And I am sure there are hundreds of nice, even "over educated" girls in England who would make excellent and good wives to your Western men in the East and keep them straight, and who would cheerfully share the hardships and loneliness of jungle life without frivolities and extravagance.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

A Western Woman.

FORTUNE-HUNTING PARSONS.

Sir,—May I cite you a recent case which happened in the county of Cheshire? A poor curate, stipend £50 or £60 a year, made himself distinctly aggressive on the political platform, was brought favourably under the notice of a noble patron, and in less than three years from his acceptance of the curacy was preferred to a snug little living of £400 or £500 a year, and "led to the altar"—isn't that the phrase?—the daughter of one of the wealthy members of the church of which the parson was formerly the curate, and which fond parent is currently reported to have settled £500 a year upon his daughter. And the parson is well under 30. Strange, isn't it, that the love and the shekels were so linked together?—Yours,

Another Layman.

Sir,—Having read "A Layman's" letter in your issue of October 19, I decided to "wait and see" if the views of others on this subject were forthcoming.

My experience is almost identical with that of your correspondent "A Parson," for among some hundreds of clergy whom I have met I have only known one who, having married a well-to-do lady, retired from clerical work before he was forty, and as to that marriage "least said soonest mended."

The phrase "comfortably dowered" is vague, and in the minds of some people is identical with what is styled with strict accuracy "having a little money." I echo "A Layman's" wish for any statistics that may suggest themselves to him.

As a set-off to the two clergy whose object in life he alludes to may I mention two others well known to myself? One of them spoke of the aim with horror, even on the lowest ground. The other refused many overtures that were made to him by other "laymen," where the layman who is your correspondent would probably have said that he was "sedulously looking out for some one who is comfortably dowered." I am merely stating facts—without note or comment.

No doubt there are clergy who are not ornaments, including non-graduates who have had a cheap education at a theological college, where, perhaps, they received counsel and instruction from clergy who themselves were non-graduates. Happily the number of these will be diminished after the year 1917 owing to a new rule of some of the bishops. But even before that date it is hoped that their lordships will aim at quality rather than quantity in the candidates for ordination.

I hope "A Layman" will also ask for statistics about the number of clergy who have worked for twenty years or more and are still bachelors.—Yours, etc.,

Scrutiny.

THE KENNEL CLUB.

Sir,—The article in your last issue on the refusal of the Kennel Club to give a licence for a show to the Pekin Palace Dog Association because Mrs. Ashton Cross was a member would suggest that the limit of the autocratic and illegal methods of the present governing body has been reached. But is it not a fact that the members of the Pekingese Club presented a numerously signed memorial to the Kennel Club praying for remission of the sentence on this lady, and that the Kennel Club insisted that the memorialists should write and withdraw from the memorial unless they were prepared to run the risk of meeting a like or worse fate?

Surely the time has come to end this style of administration and to have a governing body representative of dog owners and dog societies, whose funds would, to some small extent, be applied for the benefit of dog breeding, instead of being devoured by highly paid officials—for at present about £3,000 a year goes in this way. The profits of the Kennel Club Show go not to the benefit of dog breeding, but to support the luxurious club-house in Grafton Street. The specialist clubs should join together, appoint a council of representatives, and form a governing body open to all. Many of them are ready to adopt this course, and all that is wanted is some person of position and ability to take the movement in hand. No doubt the last act of the Turner dynasty will be a ban of excommunication against all who venture to support such a movement, but when the present Kennel Club has ceased to govern this will hurt no one.

I trust Truth will assist in this struggle against tyranny, for the dog papers are so well directed by Kennel Club councillors that they cannot be expected to do anything but bark for their masters.

I may add that I am not a member of the Pekingese Club and hold no brief for Mrs. Ashton Cross.—Yours truly, Exhibitor.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

Rally in The Funds—The Cheapness of India Stocks—The Latest Costa Rica Settlement Scheme—Home Rails Steady Despite the Labour Cloud—The Rise in Mexican Nationals.

DESPITE Fog and Five per cent., the City has managed to look cheerful. Even Consols started off for the December account in a light-hearted mood, the Government broker by his appearance in the market as a purchaser giving courage to some people who had only been waiting a lead before buying. As stated in my article a week ago, a material rise in Consols is not to be expected, but the long-continued decline has left the Funds at a price which probably does not admit of much further decline. The improvement in Goschens has had a sympathetic effect upon kindred securities, prominent amongst which have been India issues. In this connection the following letter recently sent me by a correspondent who signs himself "Critic" is worth attention:—

I observe that you have several times recently referred favourably to a purchase of India stocks. Whatever justification there may be for the low price of Consols, there is none for that of these stocks. They give a distinctly higher yield than that given by any stocks of a similar standing. Thus:—

| | Present Price. |
|---|---|
| India Three per Cents. | 79¾ |
| Birmingham Three per Cents. | 88 |
| Brighton Three per Cents. | 84 |
| Bournemouth Three per Cents. | 84 |
| Cardiff Three per Cents. | 84 |
| Croydon Three per Cents. | 85 |
| Eastbourne Three per Cents. | 84 |
| Hertfordshire Three per Cents. | 85 |
| Cape of Good Hope Three per Cents. | 86½ |
| Ceylon Three per Cents. | 85 |
| Jamaica Three per Cents. | 85 |
| New Zealand Three per Cents. | 86 |

Indias give a yield of 3¾ per cent., while the highest yield in any other case is £3 11s. 6d. per cent. Surely the credit of India under the Imperial Government should be equal to that of any of the above-mentioned corporations or colonies! Agricultural prospects there are this season everything that could be desired.

It will be noted that India Threes have already risen more than a point since my correspondent wrote. In the foreign market a good reception was accorded to the Chinese Railway (Tientsin Pukow) 5 per cent. loan, which, offered at 100½, was eagerly snapped up. Prices generally kept hard, the Bourses being unruffled by the French Cabinet crisis or the persistent circulation of rumours—which were as persistently denied—as to civil disturbances in Spain. Another offer of debt settlement on behalf of the Republic of Costa Rica—where the bananas come from—has been made and refused. The proposal was to issue new bonds bearing interest commencing at 3 per cent. and gradually rising to 5 per cent., the A bondholders to receive for each £100 bond 75 per cent. of the new scrip and the B bondholders for each £100 bond 65 per cent. of the new. The cutting down of capital proposed was sacrificial enough in all conscience, but further than this no allowance whatever was to be made for arrears of interest, amounting in the case of the A bonds to 30 per cent. The Bondholders' Committee has taken the only course possible in refusing provisional acceptance of such a scheme.

Home Rails have remained under the cloud of the unsettled boilermakers' dispute and the spread of the coal strike in South Wales. But while this has restricted business and prevented a rise in values, prices have kept comparatively firm. General conditions are too promising to permit of much set-back in Rails, and I find in House circles that a decided change in the sentiment towards the Home Railway market has already taken place as compared, say, with a year ago. One leading investment broker told me the other day that he had lately handled orders for Rails from people who had been out of the market for years. Among the bargains to be picked up by the speculative investor are Brighton A, Great Northern Deferred, Midland Deferred, Great Western Ordinary, and Great Central 4 per cent. 1891 Preference.

In the American market the near approach of the elections failed to repress the spirit of bullishness that has animated this department of late. General business was smaller, but determined support was accorded to one or two specialties, notably United States Steels and Union Pacifics. There was also some heavy buying of the preferred stocks of the National Railways of Mexico, more especially the second preferred. The company is now meeting the interest on its 4 per cent. preferred, but has not yet paid any dividend upon the seconds. There is $123,835,600 (U.S. currency) of the second preferred outstanding, and as 1 per cent. upon it takes $1,238,356 it will obviously need a tremendous increase in the earnings of the road before the shares can get their full dividend. However, the company is making good progress. The net earnings for the first three months of the current fiscal year show an increase expressed in United States currency of about $600,000. If this rate of expansion be maintained the gain for the year would be equal to 2 per cent. upon the second preferred. I do not suggest that the company will pay 2 per cent. for 1910-11 even if it be earned, but the elasticity lately shown by the company's receipts is certainly of good augury, and explains the support lately accorded to the second preferred stock.

RAILWAYS.

The B.A. and Pacific Meeting—Central Argentine's "Rosy" Outlook.

Lord St. Davids was in great form at the meeting of the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway last week. Once more he came before the shareholders in no spirit of apology for the expansionist policy pursued by the company in the last few years (which has temporarily entailed a cut in the dividend from 7 to 3 per cent.), but with a vigorous defence of that policy. He met all his critics and questioners with a frankness and fulness which bore testimony to his intimate knowledge of Argentina in general and of the B.A. and Pacific Railway in particular. His lordship's task was certainly a more pleasant one than a year ago, for, as I stated last week, the dividend of 3 per cent. has been fairly earned, and the prospects all suggest that the company has touched bedrock. In the past financial year profits showed an increase of £270,000, of which £252,000 was swallowed up by increased fixed charges. In the current financial year the advance in fixed charges will be £150,000, and to date for only four months the company has an advance in gross receipts of £170,000, or as much as £246,000 if allowance be made for the fact that the figures for the corresponding period included £76,000 of the company's own materials on revenue account (which are carried at cost), whereas from July 1 last this misleading item has been eliminated from the traffic returns. The chairman hopes that by Christmas the advance in net receipts will be sufficient to provide for the whole of the £150,000 increase in fixed charges, leaving every penny of additional earnings in the next six months available for the ordinary shareholders. As the harvest outlook in the company's territory so far as it can be forecasted is splendid—the area under wheat and linseed shows an increase of 15 per cent., and the grape harvest in the Cuyo provinces is expected to be a record one—the chances of a recovery in the dividend on Pacifics next year are distinctly promising.

Central Argentine stocks have been an outstanding feature of the week, pointed attention being drawn to the way in which traffic increases are being piled up. The following letter is of general interest at this juncture:—

> Sir,—Personally, I'm sanguine the dividend on Central Argentine Ordinary will be increased, and after reading the unusually optimistic speech of the chairman at the recent meeting, I have doubled my holding of ordinary stock.
> The promise, so far at least, is for an abundant harvest, and at the time this is due to be carried the traffics will compare with the shrunken receipts of 1909, when the railway lost 750,000 of grain traffic owing to failure of crops.
> Huge increases for months to come may be looked for, as 650,000 tons of the old crops have to be carried still, which will swell receipts until new crop is moved. With £307,000 already in hand for sixteen weeks and two days, it would not be oversanguine to estimate the year's increase at £650,000. Put down £250,000 for increase of cost of working, £50,000 to replete balance forward, £50,000 to reserves, and there's still £300,000 left for dividend.
> The interest on the new 4 per cent. Debenture stock put at £80,000, and there's still about enough to pay an extra 1 per cent. dividend.

My correspondent invites my own opinion upon the company's prospects of paying an increased dividend for the year 1910-11. I can only say that it would be as well perhaps not to be too sanguine. The company's policy has hitherto been one of very great caution, and I remember the chairman stating a few years ago when he was urged to raise the dividend upon "Rosies" from 6 to 7 per cent. that he would not do so until he saw his way to maintain such an increase. If traffics turn out as well as my correspondent expects—and his estimate seems a not unreasonable one—the board will certainly have to consider next year whether the time has not come to give the shareholders another 1 per cent., but no doubt their decision will be influenced not only by past results but by the prospects for the financial year which will then be under way.

Minor South American Rails—Paraguay Central, Argentine North-Eastern, and Taltal.

Good progress was shown by the Paraguay Central Railway in the year ended June 30 last. The company is still hampered by the wide fluctuations that occur in exchange, but in the past year the comparison was favourable, the average premium on gold having been 1,496 per cent., against 1,622 per cent. in 1908-9. Gross receipts in sterling amounted to £97,100, an increase of £19,600, and as the working expenses at £48,789 took only £3,760 more, there was an increase in net revenue of £15,920, the total net receipts being £48,337. This sum was sufficient to pay the interest on the 6 per cent. prior lien bonds, to meet an amount of £11,500 required for special administrative expenses incurred in connection with the passage of the Bill through the Argentine Congress relative to the through connection between Ascuncion and Buenos Ayres, and to leave a balance of £15,300, which has been placed to renewal account. The profits, therefore, do not admit of the payment of interest for 1909-10 upon the company's 5 per cent. debentures, though interest for the year ended June 30, 1909, is to be paid on that stock out of the balance of £41,500 brought forward. The Paraguay Central has in the past five years more than doubled its gross receipts and more than trebled its net receipts. Those interested in the company are naturally looking forward with confidence to the results that will accrue from the linking up of the line with the Argentine North-Eastern. To effect this the gauge of the line has had to be altered. The work is now well in hand, and it was stated at the meeting last week that the railway would probably be open right away from Ascuncion to Encarnacion in January. There will then remain only the installation of the train ferry to connect Encarnacion with Posadas, the northern terminus of the Argentine North-Eastern, in order to establish through communication with Buenos Ayres. The Argentine North-Eastern is under contract to complete this train ferry before July next. The Paraguay Central's capital now consists of £510,000 prior lien 6 per cent. debenture stock, £1,300,000 5 per cent. debenture stock and £272,930 ordinary £10 shares. The prior liens at par are a fair purchase for mixing purposes; there is not a substantial margin behind the stock at present, but it should rapidly increase. The 5 per cent. debenture stock at 48 is high enough for the present, though the prospects for the company suggest that it will be worth more in a few years' time.

The Argentine North-Eastern Railway is steadily improving its position, though the sanguine hopes formed two years ago of an immediate dividend on the ordinary stock have yet to be fulfilled. For the year ended June 30 the company, after setting aside £10,000, against £9,500 a twelvemonth ago, for the renewal fund, has a balance which enables the payment of the full rate upon the 5 per cent. "B" debentures and the carry forward of £4,300. For 1908-9 the "B" debenture holders received only 3¾ per cent., and £400 was carried forward. The joining up of the line with the Paraguay Central, to which I have referred above, makes the outlook for the Argentine North-Eastern hopeful, and it should not be long before the ordinary stockholders commence to receive something. As, however, the total of the ordinary capital is the relatively large amount of £2,768,500, it will require a very considerable accession of traffic before anything substantial can be distributed to the ordinary stockholders.

The Taltal Railway, a Chilian nitrate carrying line, established a record in earnings for the past year. Although some of the smaller nitrate oficinas were closed down in the absence of a renewal of the combination, the total quantity of nitrate carried showed an increase of 40,400 tons. The company has for six years paid regular dividends of 7 per cent.; last year it added a bonus of 1 per cent., and now the bonus is 2 per cent., making a distribution of 9 per cent. for the year. The chairman was careful to point out at the meeting the other day that this bonus should be regarded as the result of a specially good year's work. The company could not expect to earn as much this year, for up till now the traffics had not been as good as in the corresponding period. The actual gross takings for the four months from July 1 amount to £78,503, a decrease of £19,698, while working expenses have been reduced £4,877, leaving the net receipts £14,818 lower. It is, however, reassuring to learn from the manager that 250,000 quintals of nitrate have been manufactured more than the company has carried, and that an improvement for the remaining months of the year is assured. The projected longitudinal railway of the Chilian Government will bring a good deal of extra traffic to the Taltal during construction, and what is of more importance the company does not fear that after the construction has been completed the new line will divert any of the traffic at present carried by the Taltal. The latter company has lately been experimenting with oil fuel for the working of its engines, and the results as described by the chairman will interest a wider circle than the company's own shareholders. He said:—

> They now had three engines of the six wheel coupled type and one of the Kitson Meyer type running with oil fuel, and the results obtained were of considerable interest. At present the price quoted for the oil was not low enough to be attractive, and they did not propose to convert further locomotives at present. They had gained most valuable experience, and would doubtless learn still more as time went on. They knew the density of the oil they required and the price they could afford to give for it as compared with coal. From stationary boilers the results obtained were more marked, and they were using oil for electric light plant with economy.

The financial position of the Taltal is a strong one. It has outstanding £267,000 of 4½ per cent. debentures and £750,000 ordinary capital. There is a reserve fund of £80,000 and a reserve for renewals and casualties of £43,329. The company's concession from the Chilian Government is in perpetuity. At 6½ the £5 ordinary shares show a yield on the basis of 9 per cent. distributions of practically 7 per cent. If the total dividend be reduced to 8 per cent. the return at present price would still be 6⅛ per cent., and allowing for the cutting off of the bonus altogether the yield upon the basis of a dividend of 7 per cent. would still be 5⅜ per cent. Shares of a South American railway dependent upon one source of traffic—whether it be nitrate, coffee, or sugar—must show good yields to be really attractive, but the figures and calculations given above suggest that Taltals are not over-priced.

RUBBER.

The Brazilian Position—Plantation Returns—The Venture Group.

Last week rubber auctions found ready buyers for the increased offerings of plantation brands, and the raw rubber market has been steadier than for some time past, fine hard Para fluctuating within narrow limits in the neighbourhood of 6s. per lb. Reports from the Continental centres closely in touch with the Rubber market indicate that less anxiety as to the immediate future of the market exists in those quarters than in London, advices from Antwerp and Brussels being of a particularly optimistic character. Hopes are largely centred on a steady American revival following the elections and on the improving outlook for next year. Manufacturers' purchases of late have been largely for 1911 delivery, and the prices at which bargains have been concluded have given a firmer tone to the market. The stocks which have accumulated recently are now over 2,000 tons in excess of those existing at this time last year, but Brazil has shown no tendency to increase her supplies, the new season's output figures for the past three months, compared with previous years, being as under:—

RECEIPTS AT PARA.

| | 1910. Tons. | 1909. Tons. | 1908. Tons. |
|---|---|---|---|
| August | 1,870 | 1,870 | 1,900 |
| September | 1,980 | 2,020 | 2,350 |
| October | 3,170 | 3,270 | 3,460 |

With the Brazilian output remaining fairly steady it is felt that a normal trade demand will suffice to keep the price of the raw article at somewhere near its present level, and that if depressions occur they will be of only a temporary character. Plantation returns, on the other hand, mark many gratifying increases, Linggi beating all former plantation records with an output for last month of 82,000 lbs. Anglo-Malay, which has not shown many notable increases this year, now records 61,259 lbs., and Highlands, whose outputs have been too steady of late to please the market, now reports an output for the month of 48,263 lbs. Among the smaller producers Gula-Kalumpong contributes 12,600 lbs., London Asiatic 20,777 lbs., United Serdang 12,864 lbs., and North Hummock 7,408 lbs. Malacca's total of 35,000 lbs. is 11,000 lbs. ahead of last year. Doranakande, with an output of 5,335 lbs., promises to exceed its prospectus estimate. The Carey United return for September increases the total output for its financial year to 107,174 lbs., and the share seems entitled to more attention from the investor than it has yet received. Upon the whole the plantation companies' output returns are of a very encouraging character, and as November and December usually bring substantial increases the year should wind up well.

The MOST COMPLETE List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times." 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

The promoter, too, who is usually a good judge of market conditions, is displaying more confidence, and it will be interesting to see how the new issues of the week are received by the public. Batu Rata is well spoken of by those who know the property, and Pongola, the Vine and General Trust new issue, is of particular interest because of its satisfactory reference to the Guiguet machine. The report that a new type of boiler has been ordered to improve the efficiency of the machine gave rise to a rumour that the patent was useless, and that the Vine and General Trust had declined to exercise their option. Mr. Dobree, whose firm reported on the Guiguet machine in March last, has recently returned from an investigation of the working of the machine under forest conditions in Madagascar, and he confirms his original report as follows:—

> We are in a position to say that our estimates of the capacity of the machines, and the percentage of rubber extracted, made as the result of our original trials of the Guiguet machine at Lyons, have been fully substantiated by the tests made on Landolphia Rehe bark under actual working conditions in the Menabe forest. The problem of obtaining a suitable plant, capable of being carried by natives through the forest, has been successfully solved.

The question of the value of the patents will be further discussed at the meeting to be called by the Vine and General Trust before its option is exercised, and so far as can be judged meanwhile the machine is all that has been claimed for it. The Madagascar company has no doubt had some early difficulties such as are inseparable from a new enterprise, but it controls over 200,000 acres of rubber-bearing forest, and the directors confidently expect to pay a dividend next year. Shares of this type are, as I have repeatedly pointed out, necessarily of a speculative type. It is not possible to ascertain their intrinsic value with any certainty, but the great possibilities which they undoubtedly possess render them attractive to investors who are prepared to take a risk.

The new works of the Crude Rubber Washing Company are, I am told, now practically completed, and shareholders will at an early date be invited to inspect the new plant. Mr. Dessau, the company's manager, is well known as a rubber expert, and he has succeeded in building up a business which promises to play an important part in the rubber world. A statement made by the chairman of the company appears to have been misunderstood by some of my correspondents. It is, I believe, perfectly true that a low price for rubber would suit the company very well, and enable it to earn profits perhaps even larger than it can earn with rubber at a higher figure. But the company holds large stocks of crude rubber, and these, of course, are as liable to depreciation in a falling market as they are to appreciation when prices are rising. From such a business it is not possible wholly to eliminate the speculative element, but the company is managed with excellent judgment, and the contracts which it makes protect it from any undue risk. There should be some good buying of the shares after the demonstration to shareholders.

Tapping has now recommenced on Jequié and West Jequié. With a capital of only £40,000 the first-named company owns about 75,000 acres of land, and it is understood that it has a profit in hand of about £20,000 derived from the flotation of the subsidiary company. At only 2s. per tree its 400,000 trees should be worth £40,000, and at present price the shares, although speculative, are at an attractive level.

The report of the F.M.S. Company for the year ending May 31 last shows a profit for the year of approximately £85,200. The sum of £8,260 is carried to reserve, and £1,880 is carried forward to the next account. The yield of the trees is still highly satisfactory, the crop representing an average yield of 302 lbs. per acre, and a block of old trees have this year given over 9 lbs. per tree.

The Kamna Purchase Price.

In dealing on October 26 with Mr. Lillingston's valuation of the Kamna estate at £135,143, I referred to a statement made by a Mr. Hilckes (and repeated by his solicitors in a letter to the press) to the effect that the estate was purchased from the original German proprietors, in February, 1910, for £7,500. Last week, in a further paragraph, I said I had been informed that the statement in question was afterwards unreservedly withdrawn and a full apology made to the original vendors. I have now received a letter from Mr. Hilckes's solicitors, Messrs. A. and E. Cohn, who say they are instructed to inform me that the statement as to the withdrawal and apology is totally untrue. "No apology," they write, "has been made, and no statement has been withdrawn, nor has the statement so far as we are aware ever been challenged." My informant last week was one of the Kamna directors, a gentleman well-known in the rubber world whose statement on such a matter I felt justified in publishing. In view of this letter from Messrs. Cohn I have communicated with him again, with the result that I now find that the withdrawal and apology were made not by Mr. Hilckes but by an obscure and disreputable City rag, which after a series of violent attacks upon the Kamna Company suddenly changed its tone. This was certainly not a withdrawal or apology to which I attach the slightest importance, and the information I gave on the authority of the director to whom I have referred was misleading. He appears to have been but imperfectly acquainted with the facts of the matter on which he undertook to set me right.

No doubt the truth as to the exact price that was originally paid for the Kamna estate will eventually be ascertained. In the prospectus the sale contract of February last between the promoters and the German owners gave the consideration as £60,000, but there may, of course, have been an earlier sale at a lower price. Mr. Hilckes apparently sticks to his statement—that the price paid in February was actually as low as £7,500. On the other hand, just as I am going to press, I have received a letter from Mr. George Otto Fischer, who acted as attorney for "the parties who sold the property in England," and who states that the said property "was not bought by or sold to any one in February, 1910, for £7,500." He also states that "no such ridiculous price was paid for the property within a very considerable time, and certainly not since it was a grown plantation."

Christineville Again.

One of the worst scandals of the rubber boom was the Christineville promotion. In the prospectus, with which money was lured from the pockets of the public, it was represented that there were on this West African property 40,000 rubber trees, fully matured and ready for tapping; but the trees were found to be non-existent, and an attempt was then made to gull the shareholders with a cock-and-bull story of a disastrous fire. The matter was taken up by a committee of shareholders under the leadership of Mr. H. O. Newland, but instead of instituting the proceedings which in my opinion ought to have been instituted they agreed to a ridiculously inadequate settlement whereby the vendors were to guarantee a minimum dividend of 5 per cent. for three years. Now it appears that the vendors have not paid into the bank, as agreed, the amount required for the dividend; that Mr. Dick-Lauder, one of the directors, has resigned—and that Mr. H. O. Newland has joined the board. In a letter to the Daily Mail Mr. Newland pompously announces that he intends to see the company "through" if the majority of the shareholders will still support him. Why in the world should they support this gentleman? He has become a director, but it is difficult to perceive what benefit the shareholders at large have derived from his much-advertised committee. The law with regard to misstatements in prospectuses is not, perhaps, so effective as it ought to be. I believe, however, that if vigorous action had been taken at the time when this scandal was first exposed in TRUTH the parties responsible for it could have been compelled to disgorge the money they obtained.

MINES.

ACTIVITY IN SPECIALTIES—SOME SHARP FLUCTUATIONS—EAST RAND DEVELOPMENTS—SHAMVA MINES—BRISEIS TIN.

General business has not been brisk in the mining markets during the past week, but several individual shares have shown activity, and some substantial price movements have been recorded. Kaffirs have been sold from Germany and France as well as on local account, the recent leakages of information and the East Rand affair having disturbed the confidence of holders, and this has enabled the bears to take liberties with the market. The most important, if it had been true, of the rumours regarding the East Rand is, however, now shown to be incorrect by an official cable. By comparison with Kaffirs, Rhodesians have made a cheerful showing, although the substantial fall in Bucks Reefs which preceded the issue of unfavourable news can hardly have made the market any more popular with the public. Such improvement in quotations as has occurred in the Rhodesian section has been chiefly due to "shop" buying, which has in turn encouraged professionals to accord some support. The insiders naturally do not want the market to relapse seriously while they have fresh flotations pending. In the diamond group there has again been a moderate business, while points of interest in other directions have been the introduction of the Bullfinch to the Westralian market, the slump in Mexico El Oros and Carmens (which have since partially recovered), and the weakness of Waihis.

The further cable regarding East Rand Proprietary affairs, published on Monday, indicates that the previous absence of news as to the developments did not mean that the position had become any worse. As many of my readers are interested in this company, I append the text of the cable:—

> Development results on the basis of footage sampled as published for September quarter are slightly better than June quarter, but do not fully reflect the satisfactory nature of development, as they include an unusual number of necessary connections where the full width reef is not exposed.
> Present development in lower levels of Driefontein, Angelo, and Comet highly satisfactory, bottom of Cason also shows improvement, and some exceptionally good ground is being opened up between Angelo and Angelo Deep.
> Have every reason to believe that, judging by valuation taken out to end of September that when ore reserves are calculated at the end of the year, the average value of payable ore will be found to be virtually the same as for last year.

But for the nervous feeling that was engendered by the Kleintontein incident the adverse rumours circulated anent East Rand developments probably would have received nothing like so much attention, and had the directors issued a reassuring cable early last week the "bears" would not have found it so easy to get back shares. Rumour has it that the attack on East Rands was initiated by a prominent operator who was piqued because he was not afforded an opportunity of participating in the underwriting of the proposed debenture issue. If so, he could hardly have chosen a more propitious time for his crusade, the confidence of investors in the market having been weakened just previously by leakages of information, to say nothing of the disappointment caused by the closing down of the Van Dyk, which has been followed by a similar announcement in the case of the Cloverfield. Reverting to the East Rand debenture issue, it is officially stated that the underwriting agreement has been signed, and that circulars will very shortly be in the hands of shareholders convening the necessary special meetings to authorise the creation and issue of debentures.

Nearly a million tons of ore in sight is the latest estimate of the position at the Shamva Mines, the concern formed this year under Gold Fields' auspices. In addition to this tonnage, "probable ore" is estimated at 203,460 tons, and the engineers conclude their cable by stating that recent developments and indications are thoroughly satisfactory. This is all very well so far as it goes, but more is required to justify the present market valuation of the undertaking. There are, I believe, 500,000 shares in issue, and the price is about 4¾, making a total valuation of nearly two and a-half millions sterling. If the official predictions made as regards profits are fulfilled, and 20,000 tons a month are treated for a profit of 7s. 6d. a ton, the returns will be equal to 18 per cent. per annum on the issued capital. This would represent only about 4 per cent. on the present market value of the shares. Even this small yield, however, is not within sight, as the company, so far from having a large plant to deal with the tonnage mentioned, has not got its five-stamp sampling mill into operation yet. So that those who pay the present price for Shamva Mines are liberally discounting prospects.

The rise in tin during the last few months lends additional interest to the special report on the Briseis properties by Mr. David Currie, one of the company's consulting engineers. The southern section of the Briseis property (which, it may be as well to add, is an alluvial tin proposition) was exhausted last June, but it is estimated that there is a reserve of at least 500 tons of black tin remaining in the northern section, and that approximately 1,200 tons are contained in the Krushka's Flat area. No estimate of quantities in the Ringarooma property can yet be attempted. It has been decided that from 45 to 50 tons per month is the maximum output which can probably be maintained by the company with any degree of certainty under existing conditions, and for the next three years this output can be obtained entirely from the Briseis northern and Krushka Flat sections, leaving the Ringarooma drift practically intact for subsequent operations. The average Briseis output for the first half of the current year was 60 tons a month and the approximate profits averaged £2,250 a month, or at the rate of £54,000 a year. A drop in earnings is to be expected in view of the foreshadowed reduction in output, but the company should still be able to pay an occasional dividend. Out of the 1909 earnings a sum of £20,000 was placed to reserve, and gilt-edged investments at cost figured in the last balance-sheet at nearly £50,000. Besides its tin properties, the Briseis has gold-dredging leases in Victoria, from which, according to Mr. David Currie, steadily increasing profits may confidently be expected. At the present price of 6s. 6d. per share the whole of the Briseis undertaking is valued at only £195,000.

WESTRALIAN MARKET EXPANDS—"BULLS" AND BULLFINCHES—CONTINUED COLONIAL EXCITEMENT—OROYA EXPLORATION'S INTEREST IN THE NEW FIELD.

Will the Yilgarn discoveries—some information as to which I gave last week—lead to a revival of interest in Westralian mining in general? This is one of the questions of the moment in the world of mining finance. The answer to it must depend very largely upon the results that attend the prospecting work in progress or about to be initiated in the district consequent upon the rich discoveries that have been made upon the Bullfinch area. Already, however, the enthusiasm which has been aroused on the Colonial Stock Exchanges has been followed by an increase in the personnel of the Westralian market here, jobbers having migrated from other parts of the House. So far they have concerned themselves chiefly with the Bullfinch, whose shares were introduced on the market the day after the publication of my last notes, but the probability is that attention will be turned to other schemes in the same district, and unless the Yilgarn gamble soon receives a serious check we may easily see the older Westralian issues become a freer market. For a long time dealings in these have been on so small a scale that dealers have not cared about keeping many shares on their books, and it has not taken much business in either direction to affect prices. The recent fall in Sons of Gwalia, which have since recovered, was attributed to selling orders of no great volume coming on the market and finding jobbers disinclined to take shares because of the general lack of interest in things Westralian. With an increase in the number of dealers, however, there will be more competition for business, and instead of prices being little more than nominal and liable to be materially affected by a small transaction, shares generally should become more readily marketable.

The shares of the Bullfinch Proprietary (W.A.), Limited, capitalised at half a million sterling in £1 shares, of which the vendors take 300,000, in addition to £100,000 in cash, were introduced on the market last Thursday at 30s. apiece, and two days later the quotation was up to over 50s. I understand the rise was largely brought about by colonial speculators, who seem to have got the fever badly. The Bullfinch is not without merits, but it is ridiculous that the market valuation of the concern at this juncture should be nearly a million and a-quarter sterling. Developments are stated to show a "profit in sight" of £250,000, and should the sensationally rich strikes be repeated in other parts of the property this sum may soon be largely exceeded. But to value the enterprise at nearly five times the "profit in sight" estimate—which estimate, by the way, is not that of a disinterested party—is only what speculators with the gambling fever very badly upon them would be capable of doing. On the London market speculators have been taking profits, but up to the time of writing the colonial demand has more than counterbalanced the local realisations.

Several other flotations are on the stocks in connection with properties in the same district as the Bullfinch. The idea is that, having seen how high this particular bird has been flying, the public will rush after any other specimens in the Yilgarn aviary that may come in sight in the near future, especially if there is plenty of ground-bait in the form of cables and reports as to developments. The new field may prove the great success some have already assumed it to be, and Kalgoorlie's "Golden Mile" may be put in the shade, but even so the public may lose money over it unless they are very careful.

One of the least risky methods of acquiring an interest in a new mining field is to buy the shares of an already established finance and exploration company which has secured property or options on areas on that field. I know of one such company in connection with the Yilgarn field—namely, the Oroya Exploration, whose 10s. shares are quoted about 15s. Beside a large holding of Oroya Black Range shares and a substantial amount of cash, the Oroya Exploration has under option the Corinthian North mine and adjoining leases situated about ten miles from the Bullfinch, on the Yilgarn field. A certain amount of development work has been done on the Corinthian North, and the State mining engineer, after a visit of inspection to the field, is reported to have spoken hopefully of the outlook for the property. If by reason of the great excitement in the colony the Oroya Exploration is able to float off its Yilgarn interests, the company will no doubt come out with a handsome profit, while in the event of Yilgarn proving a disappointment the position of that company should not be at all seriously prejudiced, as it has other useful assets. Oroya Explorations may not have any spectacular advance, but they certainly have speculative possibilities in view of the attention now being devoted to the Yilgarn field. By the way, it has been stated in one or two papers that the options on the Corinthian North and adjoining leases are held by the Oroya Black Range. They may have been acquired in the name of that company, but they belong to the Oroya Exploration. Apropos of both these companies, I hear that the Youanme Mine, in which they are jointly interested, is developing in a promising manner. This is another of the strings to the bow of the Oroya Exploration, and it also gives Oroya Black Range shares an additional speculative interest. The latter have moved up a little (to about 11s.) during the past week, and with increased attention being devoted to Westralians, may easily go higher.

INDUSTRIALS.

Coats' Record Figures—Increased Profits Put to Reserve—Hotel Cecil's Poor Results—Cape Electric Trams—A Moving Picture Entertainment—Promise and Performance.

The chief item of interest for the industrial market last week was the issue of the preliminary figures of J. and P. Coats for the year ended June 30 last. The market was not disappointed in the earnings themselves—for the net revenue of £3,171,500 exceeds that of 1908-9 by £253,800, and establishes a fresh high record for this great enterprise. Those who have been buying the shares at the high prices lately recorded, however, were disappointed in their expectations of an increase in the bonus. The total dividend for the year (inclusive of a bonus of 5 per cent.) is again 35 per cent., the bulk of the increased profit being put to dividend reserve. Instead of placing £500,000 to general reserve, as was done a year ago, a like amount is being appropriated to extinguish the balance of the company's debenture debt. The financial position of Coats is immensely strong. The dividend reserve fund now amounts to £1,575,000, equal to 35 per cent. of the ordinary capital, while the general reserve fund stands at £4,500,000, nearly half the entire share capital.

The gross profits of the Hôtel Cecil, Limited, in the year ended August 31 amounted to £176,430, or £10,729 less than in the previous twelve months, when a decrease was shown of £13,904. After deducting expenses and debenture interest the sum remaining is only £11,501, and the dividend on the preference has had to be reduced from 3 to 2 per cent. There is now 12½ per cent. of arrears on the 5½ per cent. preference shares. The company is hoping for better times in the coming year on account of the Coronation. In Truth of September 14 I referred to the improvement in the position of the West India and Panama Telegraph Company, and recommended a purchase of the £10 first and second preference shares, both of which then stood at about 9. The present quotations are first preference 10¼ and second preference 10. The company has just announced that it will clear off the remaining arrears of interest upon the second preference, and also pay a dividend upon the ordinary shares. The Cape Electric Tramways during the year ended June 30 last earned a net profit of £52,200, or £5,800 more than in the corresponding period, and the results just published are arrived at after writing off the balance of flood losses at Port Elizabeth, which it was originally intended should be spread over a period of years. In place of a deficit of £2,400 there is a surplus, after meeting debenture interest, of £3,600, and the total credit balance carried forward is £9,100. The directors speak of the outlook as favourable.

A very lean report is that for the first year's business of the London Cinematograph Company (1909). Gross profits were only £10,700, and the net revenue is a paltry £2,600—which compare against the prospectus estimate of £72,100. Even allowing for the directors' statement that the theatre construction programme has been greatly retarded, the showing made is very bad. The company, I see, is already short of capital, and is seeking to raise £30,000 by the issue of 10 per cent. debentures. At last week's Aerated Bread meeting the opposition of Mr. Pownall to the retiring directors—Messrs. George Edwards and Clement Mitchell—proved ineffectual, both gentlemen being re-elected.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

The Thompson Brothers Bucket-shop.

As soon as Thompson Brothers opened their bucket-shop some three months ago at Northumberland Buildings, Trafalgar Square, a criticism of their philanthropic pretensions appeared in this column. Their booklets and circulars contain the usual claptrap about the advantages of their "methods of operating" and the absence of any charge for brokerage or commission, whereby the unwary are persuaded that the firm conduct their business for the benefit of their customers free, gratis, and for nothing. A disillusioned customer has now informed me of his experiences. He opened an account with Thompson Brothers in 200 Oil Development Trust shares at 3s per share and deposited with them £10, being the margin of 1s. per share which they required. At the end of a month he closed the deal, the shares then standing at 2s. 10½d. This left him—as he supposed—a loser of £1 5s., but instead of the £8 15s. which he expected to get back out of his £10 deposit Thompson Brothers paid him only £3 15s., coolly explaining that £5 was deducted for contangoes! Such a charge for twice carrying over the shares was, of course, preposterous; but if pigeons will enter bucket-shops they must put up with being plucked.

Prescott, Lyle and Co.

Prescott, Lyle and Co., stock and share brokers and dealers, 7, Union Court, Old Broad Street, announce on their stationery that they have been "Established twenty-four years." I do not know whether the sending of circulars and telegrams to strangers, exhorting them to engage in cover deals in American Rails and Canadian Pacifics, is a new departure on the part of this old-established firm, but if so, I advise them to drop it, because that is the common practice of every mushroom bucket-shop, and any firm pursuing it is sure to be suspected of being in that category. Two complaints have reached me from Army officers who have been pestered with communications from Prescott, Lyle and Co., and in one case injury has been added to insult through the telegrams being re-directed at the expense of the unwilling recipient.

Ashton's Latest Dodge.

H. A. Ashton, the individual who runs the Industrial Development Corporation, is fertile in flat-catching devices. His latest was the offer of "fifty shares in a West African gold mine, value £17 10s.," to the person guessing "correctly or nearest correctly" the closing price of Canadian Pacifics on November 4. The shares were in Wassau Banket, Limited, and people who failed to win the prize have been offered consolation awards in the form of the privilege of buying blocks of fifty of these shares at prices ranging from 2s. 6d. to 6s. 6d. each. Ashton has the effrontery to pretend that Wassau Bankets cannot be purchased elsewhere for less than 7s. a share; but as the result of inquiries on the Stock Exchange the Financial News states that the quotation is "nothing to sixpence," that "hatfuls" can be obtained at 3d., but that the market is all one way—sellers. I commend these facts to the correspondents who, in spite of my previous warnings, are still sending me inquiries as to the Industrial Development Corporation.

R. A. Smith's Little Jest.

To preserve a becoming gravity in his compositions, to refrain from showing his tongue in his cheek, must be a hard task for the writer of bucket-shop circulars, and if he happens to have a turn for irony the temptation to give it play is well-nigh irresistible. The author of the latest effusion issued by R. A. Smith and Co. evidently succumbed to the temptation. After assuring you that "a sum of £3 is of no great utility in the world," so that it may as well be handed over to R. A. Smith and Co., he proceeds:—

> Our system, which has now been reduced almost to a scientific method, places the chance before you of utilising even so small an amount as the means of creating not only a fair capital, but the possibilities of a permanent income.

"Places the chance before you" is a really happy description of the system, but I should not myself call it scientific. Nor was that the word in the mind of the jury in the Lord Mayor's Court when, after hearing evidence of the business methods of R. A. Smith and Co., they urged that such businesses should be brought under the notice of the Public Prosecutor. Here is another gem from the same circular:—

> We have reduced speculation to almost a gilt-edged investment, inasmuch as one knows at the outset the total extent of one's liability.

How comforting this must be to the greenhorns who are fooled out of their money by these gentry. As they knew beforehand what they might lose, they should regard the loss as almost a gilt-edged investment!

"The Gem of Investments."

I think the British Counties Exchange, Limited, Queen Avenue, Castle Street, Liverpool, is perfectly justified in claiming that the "investment plan" it has devised is "entirely unique." Certainly I have never come across anything quite so audacious before. Diamonds ("set in an 18-carat gold setting") are recommended by the Exchange as a safe and suitable medium for the investment of spare earnings, and to bring this form of investment "within the reach of the person of limited means as well as the capitalist," such persons are offered the advantage of what is described as "our diamond contract." By this document the investor binds himself to make eighteen monthly payments, and on the completion of those payments the Exchange undertakes to deliver to him a diamond or diamonds of a certain "retail value." If, for instance, the monthly payment is 5s., making a total of £4 10s., the "retail value" of the diamond is to be £5. The fixing of the said "retail value" is, however, left absolutely to the discretion of the Exchange; and, furthermore, if the "investor" gets into arrear for a week with any of his instalments, he may be fined 5 per cent. on the amount, and if the fine and the overdue instalment are not paid within a month the contract "shall lapse and become void, and all instalments paid thereon shall be forfeited."

The directors of this remarkable concern are Messrs. George W. Edwards, solicitor, 6, Castle Street, Liverpool, F. L'Estrange Joseph, J.P., 12, Tithebarn Street, Liverpool; Frederick Murgatroyd, chartered accountant, Duchy Chambers, Clarence Street, Manchester; S. Hargreaves Reece, Hawke Street, Liverpool; and F. H. Sugg, of Messrs. Frank Sugg, Limited, Sheffield, Cardiff, Leeds, and Liverpool. There is, I suppose no reason why the Exchange should not employ touts—as is being done in Liverpool—to induce people to enter into these foolish and one-sided contracts. But it is surprising that the directors should sanction the pushing of the scheme by means of a booklet containing pernicious nonsense about an "investment" plan, "whereby saving is made easy."

NEW ISSUES.

Applications are invited for the purchase of 500,000 one dollar shares of the Canadian Mills and Timber, Limited, at the price of 4s. per share. The company, which is incorporated in British Columbia, has an authorised capital of $1,000,000, and was formed to acquire timber rights over an area of forty-nine square miles in Rupert District in Vancouver Island. According to an expert's report, there are one thousand and ninety-seven million feet of timber on these properties. The purchase price paid by the company is $800,000, of which $500,000 is payable in shares and the balance in cash.

With a capital of £300,000 in £1 shares the Pongola Rubber Estates, Limited, has been formed to acquire a lease granted by the Government of Natal of 600 square miles in Tongaland, Zululand. The company also acquires a licence of the Guiguet patent machinery for extracting rubber from the indigenous vines said to abound in this area. The purchase price to be paid by the company is £182,500, payable as to £32,500 in cash, as to £125,000 in shares, and as to the balance in cash or shares at the option of the directors. There are now offered for subscription 125,000 shares, and 50,000 are held in reserve, the present issue providing £50,000 for cash working capital.

Particulars are published for public information only of the Bullfinch Proprietary (W.A.), Limited, a company formed to acquire mining properties in the Yilgarn Goldfield, Western Australia.

The Julian Hawthorne Company offer for sale 500,000 shares of one dollar (4s.) each of the Hawthorne Silver and Iron Mines, Limited, a company incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware, U.S.A., to acquire certain iron ore and silver properties in the Province of Ontario. The share capital is £3,000,000, divided into 15,000,000 dollar shares. It may be recollected that a short time ago Mr. Julian Hawthorne embarked upon a remarkable circularising campaign with the object of finding purchasers for these shares at 2s. each. They were not recommended by TRUTH at that price, nor are they recommended now that it has been doubled.

Railways.

ACONITE.—The share you name was the one to which I meant to refer.

CORSICAN.—Not much margin behind either at present, but they possess fair prospects if locked away for a few years. COPTHORNE.—Probably not much below 50, but defer averaging for the present. C. M.—1. Too speculative. 2. I cannot name one at the moment, though if I come across such a one you may depend upon finding it dealt with in my weekly notes.

JUVENIS.—They both stand a little above your buying prices. But I see no reason why either should be sold now.

DICKLVE.—Manila Railway preference, Argentine North-Eastern ordinary, or Paraguay Central 5 per cent. debenture stock are amongst things answering to your description. They are obviously of a very speculative character.

NIAGARA.—I regard it as a risky holding. NORTHERN.—The preferred ordinary is a very fair investment, but the company's 5 per cent. preference stock is much the safer, and therefore more suited to your purpose. It yields nearly 3⅞ per cent. NIX.—Ultimate prospects good, but for the present the stock is of a speculative character, and looks pretty fully valued.

THOR.—I do not see why you should get rid of your one-third proportion in Home Railway prior charge stocks, assuming they are individually sound stocks. The fall from the inflated levels of the nineties has been severe, but I think it has about run its course by now.

Mines.

AALESUND.—I gather that the company will eventually require more capital, but am informed that closing down need not be feared. AIRDRIE.—1. They may rally a little in sympathy with the larger shares of the group, but are not a very promising holding. 2. Hold. 3. I see no reason at present to expect much advance.

BEACON.—1. I think you will eventually see a good profit, and would keep them for the present at any rate. 2. I cannot say when another dividend will be declared.

C. R.—I have little information as to the concern, and have not seen a recent price for the shares.

E. B.—You might average Nos. 1 and 3.

G. K.—Prospects very speculative, and I see no reason at present to expect much advance in the shares. GRINDER.—I think you could make a better selection for exchanging into.

HALCOMB.—Averaging would, I think, turn out satisfactorily in time. H. A. R.—The City Deep is not likely to pay substantial dividends for some time yet, but the shares are a hopeful lock up. HERON.—It is said that developments have latterly been less satisfactory.

KINGFISHER.—I doubt whether they will rise to the extent you mention.

LONDONDERRY.—Recent developments have been of a disappointing nature. The shares do not appear intrinsically cheap even at the reduced price.

MIRANDA.—I am not greatly attracted by the shares named at present, though they may have a moderate rise in time.

PHALLIC.—1. I should be inclined to keep them rather than sell now they have come down in price. 2. A small dividend may be announced next month. PLUG.—1. A dividend is still some way off, but at the present price the shares have lock-up possibilities. 2 and 3. Pure speculations, and not particularly attractive ones.

R. E. S.—Keep East Rands for dividends. See reference in my Notes this week. R. A. C. (Alderley).—1. Keep those you have but put the additional money into something else, and thus spread your risk. 3. Hopeful as a lock-up speculation.

SPARTACUS.—Both very speculative, and I see no reason at the moment to expect much improvement.

T. P. H.—I will bear your suggestion in mind.

YORKSHIRE.—Better exchange into something more promising.

ZEBRA.—1. Sell on a moderate recovery. 2. These might be held for dividends. 3. Very much of a gamble, but may go better with other shares later on.

Mixed Securities.

AGRICOLA.—1. No complaints, but as a bucket-shop making its profits out of the losses of its customers it should be avoided. 2 and 3. I should prefer Abbontiakoons, but whether they will have much early advance I cannot say. AYRSHIRE.—1, 2, and 6 are worth holding. No. 5 should have some recovery when markets improve, and No. 6 should have speculative chances. AQUA.—1. I would not put up more money. 2. The purchase price being all in cash was an unfavourable feature, but I know of nothing definite that would justify calling the concern unsound. At the same time, like all oil ventures, the shares are necessarily very speculative. ALCESTE.—1. Messrs. Court and Sparrow, 8, Laurence Pountney Hill, E.C. 2. Hold and await the outcome of the negotiations going on between the company and the Chinese Government. 3. South Blocks and Zincs appear promising speculations from a lock-up point of view.

CUIDADO.—Nos. 1 and 2 are in the front rank as investments. I see no particular reason why you should sell 3, unless you want to transfer the money to something safe. CICESTRIAN.—1. Hold. 2. They might be held as a speculation, but it is too early to attempt an estimate of the return you are likely to get upon your money. 3. Sell on any recovery. 4. Sell. CIRCARS.—1. The prospectus did not impress me favourably, and I should not care to buy the bonds. 2. There are two or three stocks of the city quoted here, but not the particular one to which you refer. 3. Redemption of the 1907 loan is not to commence until 1922. COLLENITE.—1. Independent so far as I am aware. 2. Both speculative, but I think purchases would result profitably sooner or later. 3. See my Notes in this issue. 4. Take them up; the outlook is promising. CADZON.—1. They are a rather speculative holding at the present price, and I should be inclined to secure the satisfactory profit showing. 2. The concern may do better in the current year, but I do not regard its shares as particularly attractive. CENTURION.—They are three sound stocks, and I see no reason at present why you should sell either.

ENAJ.—I do not recommend the proposed exchange. The stocks recommended are amongst those that have been pushed for sale by the Investment Registry, and two out of the three possess no proper market. EAGER.—The two Industrials are very fair holdings. Keep the mine shares for a better market.

GUERNSEY.—I dealt with the fall in Consols in an article last week. The stock is unlikely to fall much further, and I think you ought to hold. GOLDEN T.—1. Not for some time. 2. Hold for some recovery. 3. Keep them.

HENRY.—They would make three good investments.

ISY.—1 and 2. I would hardly advise you to buy now. 3. The question is too vague. If you will state the amount you have to invest and the lowest rate of interest you are prepared to accept, I should have something to go upon. I do not initiate speculation in this column.

JEROD.—1. Have nothing to do with the firm. 2. I do not care for them. JOEY.—Among the rubber shares I should sell Nos. 13, 22, and 24. Nos. 2, 4, 5, 7, 15, 18, 23, and 26 are worth holding for improvement. Nos. 1, 6, and 12 are good shares, but not likely to increase greatly in value. Of the rest of your list you might realise Nos. 8 and 14 and retain the others.

KERRY MAN.—1. I do not approve of it or any such system of bonds or house-purchase certificates; see article under "Insurance" in last week's TRUTH. Apply to the Scottish Temperance Life Office, 31, Cheapside, London, E.C., for particulars of policies combining life assurance and house purchase. 2. Have heard nothing since the prospectus. 3. Better sell these. You must not regard any oil share as "safe." KENSINGTON COURT.—Nos. 1, 2, 5, and 6 are fair speculative investments, though not the things I should advise for a lady. In any case better leave out Nos. 3 and 4.

LOCHSTON.—Yes.

MAHRATTA.—Southern Alberta Land 5 per cent. debenture stock might suit, also Dominion Iron and Steel 5 per cent. bonds.

OWL.—Nos. 1 and 2 would be all right. I would not buy No. 2. OROYA INVESTOR.—1. I do not advise dealing with any outside firm. Do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange. 2. I would hold rather than sell at the present price. 3. A hopeful speculation. See my Notes this week.

RAG.—In the circumstances you might select Union Pacific Railroad 4 per cent. 1st lien and refunding bonds, Kansas City Terminals 4 per cent. bonds, City of Budapest 4 per cent. bonds, and National Railways of Mexico 4½ per cent. prior lien bonds. RICHPAR.—No. 2 and the bonds of No. 3 would be fair semi-speculative selections. I do not recommend No. 1, and would suggest instead Metropolitan Electric Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock.

SPOON.—No; see reply to "Enaj." SEYCHELLES.—1. The course of the price now turns upon the directors' policy regarding the payment of an increased bonus. Taking the long view, I do not regard the shares as over-valued, but there may be fluctuations in the next few months after the sharp rise that has recently occurred. 2. Not a share I should have advised. Shares of patent companies are always risky, and this concern has not yet stood any hard commercial test. 3. They might be held. 4 and 5. Hold for some eventual recovery. 6. Sell on any recovery. SPECULUM.—1. If you buy it you must regard the others as a good gamble. 2 and 3. Fair speculations for a rise sooner or later. SAMAND.—1-3. You might keep these. A further rally in 1 and 2 is not unlikely in the course of the next few months. 4. Impossible for me to say.

TAN.—Kansas City Terminals 4 per cent. bonds.

WEST SURREY.—You might put part of the money into Tremelbye.

ZAMBUK.—1. It is estimated at about nine years. The last dividend was 5 per cent., declared in December, 1909. A purchase might yield a small profit in time. 2. A fair speculation.

RUBBER.

AD.—1. It is a bucket-shop publication, which was dealt with in TRUTH some time ago. 2. Yes; but they cannot be floated until the markets are favourable. A. B. C.—1. Hold for the present. 2. Gula-Kalumpong was floated last June. Yes. It is a non-speculative share, likely to increase in value. The £1 shares are now quoted at 2. AXE.—Make the exchange, and average Crudes as you suggest. ALMA.—Northumberland, Doranakande, and Ceylon Timber and Rubber are cheap Ceylon shares. A. B.—A good selection. I agree with your broker's advice as to United Serdang. It is not possible to forecast Lewa results with any confidence. Ledbury and Kellas are quite sound, and the latter should suit you. ABBOTT.—1. A good company. 2 and 3. Should reach your price again. 4. The dividend for 1909-10 was 17½ per cent. The output of rubber will be 50 per cent. higher this year. AJAX (Torquay).—1. Neither possesses the best of soil, and production may be a year or two behind the A. B. C. estimates. 2. Difficult to forecast, but on a low five years' basis No. 1 is worth par, and No. 2, say, ¾ premium. 3. I confirm my opinion, but they are, of course, more speculative than Malayan shares. AVALANCHE.—1. In good hands, but is developing slowly. Sell on any rise, and exchange for Taiping for quicker results. 2. Hold. The present output consists of balata only. 3. Crudes bought at your price are well worth holding. A. R. M.—1. Average now. See reply to "Sidmouth." 2. You might keep Kifulu as a promising speculation, but sell the other. ADSUP.—1. Very speculative. Ultimately it should turn out satisfactorily, but meanwhile it may go lower, and if you are not prepared for a lock-up I advise you to sell. 2. Conditions have changed, and I should not care to predict a rise to your figure, but I should certainly hold for a substantial improvement. ABYSS.—See Rubber Notes and replies to "Slainte" and "Sidmouth."

BRAINTREE.—Good shares. Hold them all for a few months. BOLDERAA.—1. Purchase price was rather high. A fair lock-up at present price. 2. A good estate. Hold for a profit. 3. Well managed. I should not sell at a discount. BOSUN.—1. Yes. I should say 10 per cent. on present price. 2. No. The acreage valuation is too high. 3. Tremelbye, Langkat Sumatra, Prye. BUFFS.—Tremelbye, Batu Caves. BALU.—1. Taiping is a first-class property, and has some old trees yielding 14 lbs. per tree. Management excellent. Estate purchased on five years' valuation. Prospectus estimates very moderate, and were based on the output of only one of the three estates. Planting programme will reduce capitalisation per acre. 2. Sound as a permanent holding and good for improvement. BONAVENTURE.—1. Well managed. Cheap share. But district not first-class. 2. Tremelbye, Glen Bervie, or Taiping would suit you better. 3. Take a small profit. 4. Speculative. Hold for a profit. 5. Yes. BENGAL.—Good of its class. Cost of production was too high to please the market. Worth averaging, but take a profit when you see one. BAZAAR.—The delay is unreasonable, and most of the shares claimed have now been delivered. BRIGADIER.—1. A sound industrial investment. Worth present price, although a probable increase of capital might temporarily affect the dividend. 2. Speculative, but should recover to your figure when promotion business again becomes active. BALD.—Yes. I look for a recovery, and you might average as you suggest.

CARTER.—I am sorry to hear what you say as to "Queer Street," but I happen to recollect that more than once I impressed upon you the need of caution. One reply I gave you as follows:—"You should take at once a substantial portion—at least half—of the very large profits shown by the purchases made on my advice. I have suggested higher selling prices for some of the shares, and I still believe they will be reached, but that is no reason why you should hang on to all you have. No mere prediction can be an absolute certainty; the cash now would be." With reference to your present inquiries: 1, 2, and 3. I think well of Madagascar as a speculative holding, and the Prefs. should receive a bonus at an early date. 4 and 5. Hold all for an improvement. But you hold too large a proportion of speculative shares. 6. Date not yet fixed. CATHERINE.—Sapong is a good purchase, but I do not expect any "sudden large rise" in price. I look for steady appreciation, but there is no dividend immediately in sight. CROFTON.—1. Poor. Frequently criticised in these columns. 2. A good speculative holding.—3. Sound enough. CHERE.—1. Hold for improvement. 2. Speculative, but I expect to see a substantial advance. 3. A sound holding. 4. Taiping, Ceylon Timber and Rubber. 5. They should do so in an active market. CICESTRIAN.—Taking one with another, you should see your money back if you hold for a year or two, and they should eventually give you the return you mention. They are, however, mostly of a very speculative description, and you should take profits when you see them. Sell 9 and 10 at the first reasonable opportunity. COSMO.—1. Rumours current last month as to Highlands were officially denied. The outputs have not shown much increase since the beginning of the year, and fears were expressed that the late Mr. Bailey's holding might be thrown on the market. 2. Too cheap to sell at present price. 3. Yes, on a substantial rise. 4. Tapping has commenced, but for first two years dividend not likely to exceed 5 per cent. CURA PECULI.—Well managed company; paid 7 per cent. for 1907; 6 per cent., 1908; 8 per cent., 1909. The debentures should be safe, and a desirable investment if they confer the right to convert into ordinary shares. The market, however, is limited. C. P. R.—The shares belong to the speculative group, but should be held for a substantial recovery. The companies are in good hands, and capably managed. 1. Madagascar has made considerable shipments of rubber, and a dividend should be forthcoming at an early date. 2. Nyassa will not show much progress until early next year. 3. The Crude Company is establishing a very large business, and you should see developments on the opening of the new works. COMET.—See previous reply. There is a reasonable chance of their recovering to your figures. Taiping should be held, but I cannot fix limit at present. CARLISLE.—Quoted weekly in Investors' Chronicle. CHICKEN.—Condemned in these columns. Watch for an opportunity to sell. CIRCARS.—All sound. The first two should give you 10 per cent. Bertam say 6 per cent. Write again before you leave. CONNEMARA.—Three very sound companies. Hold them all. CASCARA.—1. The delay is unreasonable, but I am afraid you must wait. It is not necessarily a bad sign. 2. Prospectus estimates an output of 5,000 lbs. for 1911. CARS.—See Rubber Notes. Hold your shares. CLUTHA.—Have nothing to do with it.

DORIS.—1. Hold them all. 2. Sell No. 5 when it touches your price again. DRESDEN.—1. A good purchase at anything under 1 premium, but don't be afraid to take a profit. For permanent investment I prefer cheap rubber shares. 2. A cheap estate, and, although the district is not first-class, the company should turn out well.

EAST SUSSEX.—Worth holding as a speculation, but they cannot move far until promotion business again becomes active.

FALKIRK.—1. Speculative, but I have a good opinion of their prospects. See Rubber Notes. 2. Worth holding as a permanent investment. 3. Look for improvement. 4. Is in good hands, but is developing slowly. An exchange for Taiping would probably give quicker results.

HEVI.—1. General depression. Madagascar shipments to date have consisted partly of purchased rubber, but the output of extracted rubber should now increase rapidly. 2. Might perhaps pay a dividend early next year. 3. Prospectus estimates dividend, 1914, 25 per cent., with a profit of 2s. per lb. 4. They should do so. HOLMESDALE.—The Majedie issue was criticised by me on flotation because the property was reported on by an unknown valuer, and the purchase price seemed high. The valuation was, however, confirmed, I understand, by Mr. Henly. The issued capital is £110,000, of which £42,000 is working capital, and I certainly advise you to accept the offer at 1s. 3d. per share. HOPEFUL.—1. Tebrau is a very sound company, and the quotation should eventually exceed your price. Tapping commenced in July, and the company may earn a dividend during the current financial year. 2. You paid a high figure. The company is in good hands, and should prove a success. The estate is in Southern India, where labour is cheap. Tapping in a small way probably commences this year. 3. Also in Southern India. Under good management. Now tapping. Price reasonable. HERMIT.—See Rubber Notes. I have a good opinion of it as a speculative share, but it would be mere guesswork to attempt to fix the intrinsic value. HAMLET.—1. See Rubber Notes. 2. Good speculative holding. I should not sell at present price, but cannot forecast dividend. 3. Should earn a dividend this year. Hold.

INVESTOR (Macroom).—a. Yes. b. A good purchase. c. Cannot fix limit at present.

J. A. L.—1. Probably. 2. Accounts will probably be made up to December 31. 3. I hardly think so, although the profit in hand from the subsidiary sale might justify it.

KILLINEY.—Scale applies only to Malaya. United Serdang is cheap, and the better of the two.

LA VERDAD.—You hold some very good shares. Hold Anglo-Malay and Linggi for a profit. Sell the South American shares when you can. Buy Tremelbye, Langkat Sumatra, and Taiping.

MARS.—Hold Nos. 1 and 2. No. 3 is in good hands, but is developing slowly, and an exchange for Taiping would probably give quicker results. MAHAN.—All good for improvement. Bode is a Borneo company, and a 5 per cent. dividend is guaranteed until 1913. MANOR.—A poor thing. Watch for an opportunity to sell. MACDONALD.—Nos. 1 and 2 are good speculative purchases at present prices. I have criticised No. 3. Hardly worth selling now, but I should not average. MOLINERO.—Anglo-Malay output to date is 535,000 lbs., and should exceed 650,000 lbs. for the year, but the company's revised estimate was a trifle optimistic. It takes two months to market the rubber. The reduction in the directors' qualification was not unreasonable, but it rather suggests that every director does not wish to tie up £6,000 in the company indefinitely. MONGO MIDGE.—No. 5 is, of course, more speculative than your other holdings, and I should not sell the sounder shares to pay calls on the former. No. 5 should go better, but you should sell it if you are forced to realise. MOY.—Nos. 2, 3, and 4 may safely be held for six months. Sell No. 1 when it shows you a profit, say at 10s.

NOVICE.—I prefer Taiping. NAT.—Average No. 1. There is no real difficulty as to the Kinta Kellas title. NESSIE.—I criticised the company on flotation. It is unfortunate, but legally you are bound to pay the call.

ORPINGTON.—Hold for a substantial recovery.

P. E. L. B.—Taiping and Glen Bervie should suit you.

QUAGGA.—All worth holding. Average b and c.

RONDO.—Exchange No. 2 for Taiping. Hold the others for improvement. RIFLE.—A sound company, but the district is backward. As you are a large holder, sell half, and buy Tremelbye and Taiping. RESI.—Very unfortunate. Malacca management was no doubt at fault, but the worst I think is now known. Hold your shares for a steady recovery as the outputs increase.

SOWKO.—You need not be nervous about Linggi, Allagar, or Malacca. I agree with your broker's advice as to the others. After any recovery send me a full list with prices paid, and I will advise you which to sell. SEAVIEW.—1. Hold Linggi. Sell the others and buy Tremelbye. 2. Chersonese is well spoken of, and may earn a dividend next year, as should also Taiping. Bukit Mertajam is sound, but may be a year later. Make the exchange as you suggest if you prefer a less speculative share. SLAINTE.—1. I never expected Malacca to equal such estates as Selangor and Pataling. The soil is not so rich, but the company is very moderately capitalised and should earn very handsome dividends. 2. Disappointed as I am with the mistakes of the management, I confidently expect to see increasing outputs followed by a steady rise in the price. 3. I have not sufficient data. 4. The company, I understand, will not put forward another estimate until the local organisation has been improved. SPES.—Both sound progressive companies. SNAVE.—1. A poor concern. 2. It cannot make much profit until promotion business becomes more active. 3. Output for September was 5,485 lbs. October return not yet to hand. Look for reply next week. SKIES.—1. Lumut. Issued capital, £200,000. Planted 4,000 acres. Well managed, and has good prospects. 2. More speculative, but in good hands. Issued capital, £90,000. SUFFOLK.—Nos. 1 and 2 are very poor concerns, but at your price you should be able to get out without loss. No. 3 is worth averaging. No. 4 is cheap, and a good purchase for a small rise, but I should not hold it permanently. STELLA.—I regret the slip by which your name was given instead of initials. 1. No. 6, Lloyds Avenue, E.C. Say 3d. 2. No. 15, George Street, Mansion House, E.C. Say 2. 3. Up to 3s. 6d. SEYCHELLES.—1. Write to me when they exceed 50s. and I will suggest an exchange. 2 and 3. Both worth holding for some time to come. SUSSEX.—Taiping. Ceylon Timber and Rubber. SIDMOUTH.—I have dealt with your point as to Crudes in my Notes. It has proved expensive, I am afraid, but I hope to see an improvement before long. Jequié and West Jequié are now tapping. They are speculative, of course, but the companies should earn a dividend next year The former is the cheaper of the two for averaging purposes.

TYVAN.—1. I usually recommend my readers to take a profit, but in this case I should hold for a higher figure. 2. Worth holding. 3. Hold for the present. The cost of production is high. Take a profit when you see one. 4. 1911 should prove a good year for rubber. TORBAY.—Differs widely according to district, but say cost of clearing and planting, £5 to £8; upkeep, £3 to £6; cost of production, 2s. 6d., falling to 1s. TALBOT.—A good speculative share worth buying at present price, but it is impossible to forecast results with any certainty. T. S.—See Rubber Notes. A good speculative share. No report until next year.

ULSTERVILLE.—See reply to "Slainte." Your shares should eventually show you a profit, but I cannot fix a limit. Kepong is a first-class share, but I do not advise the exchange at present.

VERY ANXIOUS.—Nos. 3, 6, and 7 are sound shares, and stand the best chance of permanent improvement. The outlook has changed, and I do not expect any great rise in No. 1. No. 4 is speculative, and may show a substantial improvement, but if I were forced to realise I should sell Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5. VERITAS.—See reply to "Slainte." VIRIDIAN.—1. See reply to "Slainte." 2. Write again as to exchange when the price exceeds 50s.

YUNA.—Make the purchases you suggest. Your holding of No. 1 is too large, and I advise you to reduce it on any resumption of market activity. The prefs. have a first charge on the assets, but the shares have been depressed on adverse rumours as to the value of the patents. See Rubber Notes.

ZERO.—1. P. P. K. should gradually recover to the price paid, but I should exchange Linggi on any substantial advance. 2. Tremelbye, Taiping, Ceylon Timber, and Rubber. 3. Nothing to fear. Synthetic rubber has been an "accomplished fact" for over twenty years, but the commercial production of it appears to be as far off as ever.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AMERICAN.—1. The present price seems worth accepting. 2. Hold. 3. I do not understand your attitude of mind. You say you recognise from my warning that "one has to be wary," and now you ask me whether the concern is "safe" to trust for a small amount. Presumably, if the firm's name had appeared in a list specially recommended by TRUTH you would have written asking whether it was not a concern you ought to avoid. ANXIOUS (Ea dock).—I criticised the concern some weeks ago. The shares are quite unsuitable for a lady. AXE.—If you can afford to wait it would be worth while keeping the lot. A. D.—Its opinion is obviously not without bias. The proposed investment is not one I should recommend. ABREVAS.—1-2. I can give you the names of Stock Exchange brokers, but I hope you do not suppose that they conduct business on the lines of the firms you mention The latter are bucket-shop sharps who prey upon flats. Both have been repeatedly exposed in TRUTH. 3. No. A. C. T.—See reference in another column.

BUYER.—1. It appears to be a prosperous concern, but the company does not publish its reports, and therefore I cannot offer a definite opinion. 2. No; I have very little faith in it. BULLER.—See reply under "Insurance." BENGAL.—Yes, but the rule as to date is not strictly enforced if the two most recent are sent with those for the preceding week or weeks. BLANCHETTE.—Yes, I have received hundreds of the flat-catching circulars of Duncan, Forbes and Co., and many also of the Industrial Development Corporation. BYCULLA.—I do not recommend dealings with them for reasons explained last week. BLOTTER.—1. Fair, but lacks a free market. 2. I would suggest Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock.

CUCKOO.—1. Have nothing to do with the concern. 2. The preferred shares seem a fair risk. CRYTON.—Nos. 1 and 2 have had a successful record. I do not know 3. Have you given the correct title? CLEVELAND.—1. There ought to be very little doubt about the stability of this institution. 2. Profits liable to big fluctuations, but company has paid good dividends when trade was favourable. 3. This concern has pulled round lately, but the shares are very risky, as the yield implies. CATHERINE.—1. Prospects poor; sell. 2. The Egyptian market is inclined to look up, and you might hold your shares for the present. CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER (Windsor).—I am afraid the chances of a public recovery are poor, and should be inclined to cut the loss. CLYDE.—They are three sound investments. CHINA ASTER.—Obviously drawn, but not presented. The undrawn list would run into hundreds of thousands. CONDUIT.—So far as I know the rumours are unfounded. CYMRU.—See reply under "Insurance."

DWARF.—You ask if R. A. Smith and Co. are a reliable firm. Surely you have seen my frequent exposures of these notorious cover snatchers. DAN DAN.—They are saved from such traps if they read TRUTH, but if they will not do that I am afraid I cannot help them, and I know of nobody else who will. DUPED.—As Campbell, Robertson and Co. have disappeared it is hopeless to expect that you will recover anything. My readers were warned against them from the time they commenced business, and I published an article about them just before they disappeared. It is a pity you did not consult me before entrusting them with your money.

FURLONGS.—Keep them as a speculation. FORGET-ME-NOT.—All three good holdings. As regards No. 3, I pointed out two or three weeks ago that the new capital would rank after both the A and B preferences, and that the position of those holders was consequently strengthened by the directors' expansionist policy. F. W.—I cannot recall any public issue having been made. A new venture of the kind must necessarily take a business risk. F. G. (Grimsby).—I do not care to recommend it. Go to one of the well-known and firmly-established joint stock banks.

GOSSYPIUM.—The shares look fully valued, and I should be inclined to realise. You can possibly do so at a good profit. GET.—1 and 2. Not now. 3. None whose shares I could recommend. G. H. R.—It may be all right, but I do not take the responsibility of recommending it.

H. M. G.—I am afraid not.

J. J. J. (Bolton).—I have said often enough what I think of Duncan, Forbes and Co. They are flatcatchers.

KAMP.—I do not recommend a purchase. KOOKIE.—Regret that I have no information at present; never heard of them till I saw a circular they sent out the other day.

ORD.—1. You might select an older and stronger institution. 2. Yes.

PISCATOR.—Conditions in Egypt should improve considerably as a result of the fine cotton crop. Keep your shares for a possible recovery to the figure you name. PEARL (Dublin).—1. I cannot make such a recommendation. The Post Office Savings Bank is the one for your purpose. 2. No. PARROT.—There is no need for you to be puzzled. I have never heard anything to suggest that the concern (which is run on joint stock lines) is not a perfectly bonâ-fide undertaking. The point I wished to emphasise was that of relative strength, and on that point I can add nothing to my previous reply.

R. L.—See Note in another column.

SIMPLICITAS.—1. Not a strong concern. I should be inclined to sell. 2. They are of a speculative character, but the company is earning its fixed charges. As a speculation the debentures might be held. 3. Not a share I can recommend. I had occasion to deal very severely with the management some months ago on account of the brutalities perpetrated upon the natives by the company's local agents, and the matter has since been occupying the serious attention of the Foreign Office. SMELT.—Better not buy these. The profits appear to have shown a considerable decline in the past ten years. SOLDIER.—Not advised. A man of small means cannot afford to speculate. SKIES.—Of the three I should be inclined to choose Colorado. SUSSEX.—I should be inclined to keep them. It is very hard to say what they would be worth in the event, say, of liquidation, but a discount of 50 per cent. discounts a great deal. SIMPLEX.—All three distinctly speculative, No. 3 especially so. STAIR.—Stretton's Derby Brewery and Parker's Burslem Brewery 4½ per cent. debenture stocks answer to your requirements. SPEARMINT (Lancaster).—For your particular purpose I see no objection to either of them. What you say as to the position in the event of difficulties is, of course, correct.

THOROUGH.—You were duly answered in TRUTH of October 5 as follows:—The company has various mortgages outstanding, but only the 4½ per cent. debenture stock is quoted in the Official List. The stock you have should be worth holding. TIMIDE.—I do not advise a purchase. T.S.—1. I have heard nothing of importance; the shares are amongst those against which I warned my readers during the boomlet. 2. It came out under good auspices, but it is too early to say when actual production will commence. TYRO.—No. The Equitable Exchange is not a respectable firm of brokers, but a common cover-snatching bucket-shop.

WHITE CROSS.—An order was made last week for the compulsory winding-up of the British White Cross Milk Company.

YOUNG.—Sell 3. Keep 1 and 2.

ZANSKAR.—In the absence of a balance-sheet one can only judge by general credit, and that is not really a satisfactory method. In your case, however, I do not suppose there is any reason whatever for uneasiness.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

NEW SCHEMES—ECONOMIC LIFE OFFICES—PAY PREMIUMS AS YOU LIKE—SINGLE PREMIUM POLICIES—"BACHELOR POLICIES."

THREE features of some novelty in connection with life assurance have recently been announced by the Economic, Legal and General, and Mutual of New York life offices respectively. They are worth considering, partly on their own account and partly for the way in which they illustrate certain characteristics of life assurance in general. The purpose of the Economic scheme is to enable people to pay their premiums when they like, and as much or as little at a time as they find convenient. It is a plan that may suit certain circumstances, but it may be doubted whether the system is advantageous except in isolated cases. What it amounts to is that a man takes a policy at a single premium and forthwith borrows nearly the whole of the premium, the amount of the loan being deducted from the sum assured when the policy becomes a claim. Interest at 4 per cent. has to be paid upon this loan, which can be repaid at any time the policyholder chooses and by any instalments that he finds convenient. There is, of course, no real novelty about such a method, since every life office will lend forthwith about 95 per cent. of the single premium on the sole security of the policy, and this loan can be paid off when and how the policyholder likes. The leaflet issued by the Economic gives, in illustration of the system, a policy payable at death effected at age thirty-two. The single premium is £444 4s. 2d. for the assurance of £1,000 with profits at death; at the start the policy-holder pays £22 4s. 2d., leaving a debt upon the policy of £422, which, if the policy became a claim at once, would result in the payment of £578 to his estate. On this loan of £422 he has to pay £16 17s. 8d. for interest. If he at no time reduces the amount of the loan the transaction really amounts to this:—He obtains for £16 17s. 8d. a year so long as he lives the guarantee of £578 at his death whenever it happens, but he receives in addition the bonuses on a policy for £1,000. If he used this same premium of £16 17s. 8d. as an annual premium payable throughout the whole of life he would obtain a policy for £721, and bonuses on £721, as against a guaranteed amount under the new scheme of £578 and bonuses on £1,000. Assuming he never pays off any part of the loan, the question really resolves itself into whether the additional guarantee of £143 which he obtains under the annual premium policy is, or is not, likely to be of greater value than the larger bonuses he receives on a policy of £1,000, as compared with those on the smaller policy of £721. Especially in an office like the Economic, which charges very low rates of premium for with-profit policies, and consequently does not aim at earning large bonuses, it is probable that an ordinary annual premium policy would prove the better in the event of no part of the loan being paid off; to which must be added the further consideration that the annual premium policy entitles the policyholder to rebate of income-tax, and the single premium policy presumably does not. I say presumably, because I am not certain whether it would be possible to claim rebate of income tax, either on instalments paid off the loan, which would, in fact, be payments of premiums at irregular intervals and for odd amounts, or off the interest on the loan, which in another sense may be considered payment of premiums. I fancy it would be found that the income-tax regulations would be all against the policyholder.

So much against the scheme; but it must be pointed out that it is not contemplated by the Economic that the loan should be continued undiminished throughout the whole duration of the policy; it is specifically recommended to people with fluctuating incomes. When times are good they can pay off much or the whole of the outstanding loan; when times are bad they have a security on which they can immediately borrow practically the whole of the amount they have paid in premiums. This application of single premium policies is one that is frequently employed by members of the Stock Exchange and others. When large profits are made a single premium for a policy is paid in full. This constitutes substantial insurance protection for a man's estate, while at the same time forming unimpeachable security for at least 95 per cent. of the premium paid, and after a short time for a sum in excess of the premium. The policy need not be sold outright, but a loan can be obtained on it from the life office, usually at 4 per cent. interest, the loan being repaid in part or in full as opportunity offers. This aspect of the matter is not referred to by the Economic in their leaflet, though it well might be considering the class of people to whom the appeal is made.

The gist of the matter is that the scheme is well worth the consideration of people with fluctuating incomes, and in certain circumstances it presents even more advantages than are claimed for it by the Economic. It is not a plan to be adopted by people with regular, steady incomes, and it, of course, lacks that valuable stimulus to making proper provision by means of life assurance which comes from the necessity for paying premiums at regular dates. Incidentally it shows one way, not particularly new, but yet comparatively little recognised, in which life assurance principles can be applied to advantage in particular circumstances. The Economic is a mutual society, which was established in 1823, which, after a period of somewhat disappointing results, made an excellent showing at its last valuation, and which gives good promise for the future.

A correspondent has sent me a leaflet called Bachelor Policies, issued by the Legal and General. I am not sure whether the scheme has been recently introduced or not, since the Society is one of the very few offices which does not send me its publications. The purport of the policy is to provide a pure endowment, which shares in the profits, accompanied by the right to convert the pure endowment into endowment assurance in the event of marriage. A pure endowment, I should explain, provides for the payment of the sum assured if the policyholder lives to the end of the endowment period; if death occurs during that period only the premiums paid are returned. Under endowment assurance the sum assured, which amounts to more than the premiums paid, becomes due at death if this occurs before the end of the selected time. So long as the policy is a pure endowment the policyholder merely gets his money back in the event of early death, and he gets no share in the profits of the life office. Not only is there no insurance protection, but the money paid for premiums earns no interest. The compensation for this is that the results at the end of the period are better than under endowment assurance. The difference in premiums is not enormous, and it is not likely that the policy will prove very popular. I am not aware, however, that the profit-sharing principle has been applied to pure endowments before; this certainly seems a step in the right direction, and might with advantage be extended in connection with policies of other kinds. A special provision in the event of marriage is also unusual in connection with life assurance; the only instance of this which I call to mind is a provision made by the Star Life Office for exceptionally large surrender values for deferred annuities on the lives of women. The effect of this plan in the Star is to enable a woman to make provision for her own old age if she remains unmarried, or for a dowry of substantial amount if she marries.

I must defer to another time my comments on a valuable concession made by the Mutual of New York, which promises to become a regular feature of all progressive life offices in course of time; it is so conspicuously fair and beneficial to policyholders that the only wonder is that it was not thought of before.

Buller.—I should strongly advise you to lend no money upon the security of the shares you mention, and on no account to buy the shares, which involve a substantial uncalled liability. E. G. T.—I certainly doubt the soundness of the bonds, but should hardly like to say that the Corporation is not genuine. If you can obtain a surrender value to the extent of 50 or 60 per cent. of the amount you have paid, I should advise you to take it. Cymru.—1. Both the companies are genuine and sound, and on the whole treat applicants fairly. 2. In the improbable event of winding up policyholders might have some difficulty, but I fancy they would be all right in the long run. 3. I imagine the bond would be forfeited legally if the premiums were not fully paid. The amount of the mortgage could be deducted from the price obtained for the property. I do not, however, think that these particular companies would enforce their legal rights in such an event. Yorkshire.—The Prudential Insurance Company of America is thoroughly sound. I am amused to find that when operating in Canada they make their British loyalty very conspicuous, while indicating their American origin in very small type. Quorn.—Probably Manchester Unity of Oddfellows or Liverpool Victoria Legal. For life assurance the Prudential.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

BUENOS AYRES AND PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The ordinary general meeting was held on the 3rd inst. at Winchester House, E.C., Lord St. Davids presiding. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that when they met a year ago the outlook for the company, so far as concerned the crops in Argentina, was excellent. In common with other railways in that country, the board had had good reports from their general manager, who had cabled that the wheat crop was likely to be 30 or 40 per cent. more than it was the year before. Early in December, however, when the crop was pretty nearly in the same condition of growth as wheat was in England in July, there were severe frosts, which did a great amount of damage. It hit them very hard in the east and south of their system, but the frosts did not touch the district in the interior served by the western part of the Pacific line and by the northern part of the Bahia Blanca line, and there they had a magnificent wheat crop. The maize crop, moreover, was ruined by locusts. It was owing to these two misfortunes that the directors were in a position to recommend a dividend of only 3 per cent. With regard to the future, he read the following cablegram from the general manager :—"Due to general rain prospects wheat crop, linseed crop, excellent; better than at this time last year, and greater area wheat sown, probably 15 per cent. There are few locusts, no damage to wheat being anticipated on this account, and under favourable weather conditions there is every prospect of excellent harvest. Cattle traffic good and camps in excellent condition. Passenger traffic continues to increase. We have still some last year's wheat to carry. Bahia Blanca and North-Western Railway Company :—Wheat harvest likely to be late due to want of rain in early spring. This is especially the case in districts Rivera-Macachin and Remeco-Darragueira. Argentine Great Western Railway Company :—The increasing prosperity of the Cuyo provinces continues to attract immigration, and an all-round traffic development is being experienced. Vineyards are in excellent condition, hail or late frosts being the only danger to an exceptional grape harvest." Continuing, the chairman said that the increase in their capital charges this year would be about £150,000. That was a substantial sum, he admitted, but it was £102,000 less than they had to face last year; and when he addressed them twelve months ago the published traffics showed a decrease, whereas this year to date they had increased by £170,000. Since July 1 there had been a decline of £76,000 in the carriage of their own material, on which they made no profit. The result of that was that, in the past four months, the published traffics on which they made a profit had been increased by £246,000. If the weather in the Argentine continued fair for the next few weeks, and the wheat and linseed crops were given a fair chance of ripening, there was no doubt that in meeting the shareholders a year hence the board should be able to submit a much better statement of affairs than they were able to do on the present occasion.

Some discussion followed, after which the report was adopted, and a resolution approving the creation of 100,000 Bahia Blanca shares of £10 each guaranteed by this company was passed.

MERITINI RUBBER ESTATES, LIMITED.

A general meeting of the shareholders was held on the 7th inst. at Cannon Street Hotel to consider various reports on the property and the steps to be taken with regard to the future. Mr. Frederick Davies presided.

The Chairman said that the Meritini property was put forward as consisting of about 1,000 acres of freehold land, partially planted, containing 50,000 rubber trees tappable this year, and being on the Uganda Railway seven miles from Mombasa, together with a further plot of Government granted land, containing 640 acres of bush land not planted, situated a few miles distant. The directors, who were at that time unknown to each other, made various inquiries, all of which were satisfactorily answered, and they accordingly consented to act, a contract to acquire the property was in due course signed, and the deposit paid. He did not think that even now he could suggest any step which might have been taken to give greater assurance that all was as represented than had been taken. After the statutory meeting the first hint of anything wrong reached them in the shape of a cable from Mr. Hogg Robertson saying that he was not satisfied, and that he thought the number of trees had been greatly exaggerated. The number of trees had been successively reduced from the original 50,000 of the owners' statement, and confirmed by Messrs. Byron and Harrison on February 24 and by Mr. Thompson on April 26, as follows :—August 2, Mr. Cooper, the manager, 20,000; September 26, Mr. Max Boeder, 6,976; and October 5, Mr. Cooper, 10,000. Apart from their estimates of the number of trees, and of the development of the property, all those who had reported thereon agreed in eulogising the character of a great part of the soil and its possibilities when developed. Mr. Boeder reported that out of the 1,020 acres he inspected some 800 were of good soil and suitable for rubber and cocoanuts, and as the Ceara rubber with which they were dealing became tappable within two and a-half years of being planted, it was reasonable to expect that if it were decided to go on with the proposition and they confined themselves to the clearing and planting of as little as 250 acres a year, they should in 1913 have over 80,000 tappable trees on their property, increasing in the following year to 156,000, and with some 75,000 fresh trees coming into bearing annually from then onwards. Should the price of rubber maintain the values generally anticipated, the produce of the number of trees he had estimated for 1913 ought to yield a profit admitting of a handsome return on their very moderate capital. They had abundant working capital in hand to enable this vigorous policy to be carried out. The alternative was to liquidate the company and realise its assets, which would probably result in a return to the shareholders of 1s. per share. The directors' judgment was in favour of the former course, but the matter was, of course, in the shareholders' hands. In any case, the board was of opinion that no effort should be relaxed, in harmony with the opinion of the legal advisers, to obtain redress for the pecuniary injury which they had suffered. The chairman went on to refer to criticisms which had come to his notice as to a lack of promptitude in publishing the adverse news about the property, and gave particulars in full showing that between the dates at which the directors had written statements in their hands, and the date of the circular to the shareholders seventeen days had elapsed; not more than necessary to consult their solicitors and to draw up the document, bearing in mind that these events occurred in the middle of the August holidays. And it must be borne in mind, he said, that a board of directors incurred just as much responsibility in too hastily publishing uncorroborated news as in unduly delaying the same when properly authenticated. (Hear, hear.) In conclusion, the chairman said: And now, gentlemen, the whole case is open for your discussion. Some publicity has been given to this matter by communications to the Press, in which every adverse point in the report of Mr. Boeder, for example, has been set out and every favourable point omitted. I cannot imagine the results to be in the interests of the shareholders, whatever may have been the writer's intention. I would beg you to form an independent judgment on the whole facts, which to-day, for the first time, it has been possible to set out in a complete and connected form. If it should be evident that the predominant opinion is in favour of our recommendation that we should go on working the estate, I shall be prepared to move a resolution to that effect, or to accept one, if moved from the body of the meeting. Also, if the shareholders prefer, before coming to a decision on the future, to select a committee from amongst themselves to confer with us, we shall welcome such a committee and shall do our best to put them in possession of every fact of the case. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. T. C. Owen (chairman of Rowe, White, and Co., Limited) said he wished to make a few remarks on behalf of his firm, who were the agents of the company. Some shareholders had written and suggested that shares had been sold by the firm at large profits at a time when they had special information with regard to the unfavourable condition of the property which was not known to the general body of the shareholders. That insinuation was absolutely without foundation. There was not a vestige of truth in it whatever, and he repudiated the idea in the most emphatic terms possible. He was prepared to give dates and to support those dates by documentary evidence which was at the offices now and open to the inspection of any shareholder or any gentleman present. At the present moment the firm held more shares than the original number allotted. No one could regret more sincerely than he did the extreme disappointment which had come upon them all. He thought that every possible precaution was taken to see that this was a good proposition.

A long discussion followed, in the course of which Mr. Dowsett said it seemed to him that every report which they had received on the property was worse than the previous one. The worst part of Mr. Boeder's report was that not only was there a very large shortage of rubber trees, but that a large part of the land seemed to be uncultivable. He suggested the formation of a committee to work with the board and see what could be done.

Mr. Pyke said that drastic measures should be taken to make the persons who had benefited return some of the money which they had received.

In reply to questions, the Chairman said that the reason why he had said that tapping had commenced was that he had received a cable stating that instructions had been given to commence tapping. Mr. Dowsett had said that the greater part of the property was of no value, but Mr. Boeder said that out of 1,020 acres 800 were altogether suitable for rubber and cococanut plantations, the soil being good. The position was before counsel at the present moment, and whatever steps the law allowed them to take against those at whose hands they had suffered that pecuniary loss, the shareholders might rely upon it they would be taken.

Mr. Eves said he was one of the unfortunate shareholders who had paid a big price for shares. Although he stood to be a considerable loser, he deprecated doing anything at this meeting in a state of excitement. He was to a great extent in sympathy with the suggestion to form a committee to work independently of the directors. Such a committee would be able to report to the shareholders at a future date what was best to be done in the unfortunate circumstances in which the shareholders were placed.

Eventually a resolution was passed appointing a committee of five of the largest shareholders, independent of the directors and those connected with the promotion of the company, to confer with the board on the position of affairs, and report to a subsequent meeting of shareholders.

IVORY COAST CORPORATION.

The statutory meeting of the Ivory Coast Corporation, Limited, was held on the 4th inst., at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. J. Annan Bryce, M.P., presiding.

The Chairman said that, having regard to the very short time which had elapsed since the formation of the company, he had very little to say with regard to what had happened, because their staff, who had been out there for only a couple of months, had hardly had time to settle down. The transfer of the properties was duly effected, and everything, so far as they knew, was in order in regard to the title. The officials of the French Government, from the Governor of the Ivory Coast downwards, had been exceedingly courteous and helpful in enabling them to start business, and the directors anticipated that there would be no difficulty whatever in getting on with the French authorities, who, as they hoped, and, indeed, knew they would, seemed to have welcomed the advent of the company into that colony. Mr. Hawkins, the manager of the company, had had a very satisfactory interview with the Governor-General of the Colony, who assured him that he would do everything he could to facilitate the working of the company. Labour, which it was anticipated by some critics would turn out to be a difficulty, had shown no signs whatever of causing trouble, Mr. Hawkins having informed them that he anticipated no difficulty whatever in getting adequate supplies. That gentleman had already made arrangements to import from the neighbouring territories Yoruba and Fantica, and so on, who were able to deal with particular classes of work. Mr. Hawkins had also arranged with a great number of chiefs to bring in produce freely. When he got out there he found that the chiefs, relying upon his promise that the company should be at work in the autumn of this year, had been keeping back produce against his arrival, and as soon as the rains, which were just finishing, were over, they expected that considerable amounts of produce would come in to them. In the meantime Mr. Hawkins was pushing on with the survey of the property. They had had from their doctor a very satisfactory report with regard to the sanitary conditions of the territory, in which he corroborated fully what Mr. Hawkins had reported before the formation of the company, namely, that there was practically a negligible area of swampy land, so that the number of mosquitoes on the territory was very small. All the supplies of building materials, equipment, and so on had now got out to San Pedro, so that there would be no difficulty in a short time in housing all their people. The trading goods also were now all on the spot. The plan that the directors had adopted was to send out sample lots of immense variety, in order to discover what were the things in demand upon the coast, and as soon as they learned from actual experience through their trading agency, they would put in hand the further goods which might be indented for according to the taste prevailing at the moment in each class of goods on that strip of coast.

No resolution was submitted, and a vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

CONSOLIDATED SIGNAL CO., LIMITED.

The ninth ordinary annual general meeting of the shareholders was held on the 3rd inst. at the Westminster Palace Hotel, Victoria Street, S.W., Mr. Walter Holland, chairman of the company, presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: Gentlemen,—With regret, I have again to report that the profits show a heavy falling off as compared with the two previous years. We stated in our report last year that the railway engineering trade showed no immediate signs of improvement, and I am sorry to say that the lack of improvement has continued throughout the whole of our financial year. There has been a slackness of orders from both the home and foreign railways, and you are, of course, aware that we depend largely on our home trade. During the past two or three years there has been absolutely no development of any magnitude in the railway business of the country. Consequently there have practically been no new works of any importance to feed our factories, and, though the trade of the country, judged by imports and exports, shows signs of improvement, the railway industry has not felt it sufficiently to justify expenditure in our direction. It is a matter of regret to us to find that some of the older companies continue to manufacture their own signalling appliances. We have demonstrated over and over again that we can supply them with their requirements from our highly specialised factories at much cheaper rates than they can produce them for themselves, and we are not without hope that the railway companies will realise this, and that business may ultimately result beneficial to ourselves and to them. During the year under review all the works of the subsidiary companies have been on short time, and it is with the greatest regret that it has been necessary to discharge a considerable number of men. Notwithstanding that I view with great concern the low value of Consols and the financial unrest which appears to exist in the country, which naturally have an important influence on all proposed new works, I have every hope that the coming year will show some material signs of improvement, but we must be prepared to wait for more prosperous days. Fortunately, we have in the past acted upon such conservative and safe lines that we are enabled to do so. The total profits earned by the subsidiary companies, it will be seen on reference to the report, amount to £42,886. The directors recommend that the balance of the preference dividend be paid, making 6 per cent. for the year. This absorbs £6,051; and they further recommend that a final dividend of 6d. per share be paid on the ordinary shares, making 1s. per share for the year. This will require the sum of £3,763, leaving £3,681 to be carried forward.

Mr. Charles Hodgson seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously, without discussion, and the dividends, as recommended, were declared.

AERATED BREAD CO., LIMITED.

The fifty-seventh ordinary general meeting was held on the 4th inst. at the Cannon Street Hotel, Mr. George Edwards, J.P., presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, dealt at considerable length with the criticisms on the management. He said that, notwithstanding all the difficulties the directors had had to contend with, they had again been able to increase the business, nearly 2,000,000 more customers having been served during the period under review than in the previous year with the same number of depôts open. The board greatly regretted the reduction of profits, but if they had not done more trade the profits would have been even more seriously diminished. Since 1894, the last year of Major Child's successful management, the working expenses, over which the directors had little or no control, such as rent, rates, and taxes, had risen by about £60,000. Wages in 1894 were £48,012, and last year £90,567, and yet some of the board's critics seemed to wonder why the profits were less. Other items which had had a serious effect on the percentage of profits were the high prices of flour, meat, butter, and sugar. In spite of all these things, the dividend was 25 per cent. He mentioned that the board were unanimous in selecting Mr. Horace Pearce as general manager, and, in conclusion, he said that if he consulted his own wishes he

FEATURES AND TENDENCIES.

THIS year's motor exhibition is undoubtedly as fine as any which has been seen in previous years. But it offers less scope to the chronicler than some of its predecessors, for the simple reason that its novelties are fewer. This, however, is in the nature of things. As makers get nearer and nearer to perfection there is less and less room for improvement and innovation. On existing lines motor-cars may be said to have reached something not far short of finality. Alterations in matters of detail are, of course, always taking place—some because they are improvements; some, I suspect, simply for the sake of change.

There are, indeed, two courses open to your enterprising maker anxious to persuade the public of the excellence of his wares. On the one hand, he may point with pride to the fact that he has failed to discover a single respect in which it has been possible to improve his cars, and lay stress accordingly on their unchanged character. Or he may take the line that what was a wonderful car before has now become more wonderful still by reason of the additional improvements which continued thought and invention have suggested. Formerly the latter course was that more usually adopted. To-day the former is becoming more and more common. Hence, while there is plenty that is interesting to note in connection with this year's show, there is remarkably little that can be classed as sensational or epoch-making.

This car has adopted worm-drive; that one has got a new back axle; strokes show a continued tendency to lengthen (in sympathy, as one might say, with the long faces pulled by owners over the new taxation scale); sleeve valves are extending in favour; and so on, and so on. But none of these developments can be reckoned very startling or unexpected. In due course, no doubt, a change will come over the scene once more. Some new departure of the first importance will put a different complexion on the face of things, and we shall enter on another cycle of change and development. But at present we are at the end of one stage rather than at the beginning of a new one, and hence it is just now a matter of more or less marking time and perfecting details in default of having anything better to do.

In the following notes I do not propose to attempt anything like a detailed examination of all the various exhibits, but merely to note a few points here and there as illustrating prevailing tendencies; and for a beginning reference may be made to the all-important matter of prices.

Prices.

In regard to these, it is always a little difficult to speak very positively, for the reason that one season's models do not always coincide exactly with those of the previous year. Speaking generally, however, prices this year appear to show a decided upward tendency—the advances in some cases being quite remarkable in extent. Argylls, for instance, are "up" considerably in the case of all models. The 20-30-h.p. Cadillac which sold at £378 last year is £420 this; the 17-20-h.p. Mors has advanced from £555 to £600 the 45-h.p. Napier from £765 to £815; and so on in a large number of other cases. A few firms, on the other hand, have lowered their prices. Panhards are cheaper, for instance, in the case of some models at any rate, as also are Thornycrofts and Alldays. In yet other instances last year's prices are maintained unaltered, as in the case of Lanchesters. But on the whole it appears to be a case of "your car will cost you more."

As usual, several remarkably cheap cars are shown. The odd thing is that so little seems to be heard of these subsequently. Perhaps, however, a better fate may be in store for some of those exhibited this year. There is a little two-seater offered at £135, for instance, by the Turner Motor Manufacturing Company, who are associated also with the Turner Miesse steam cars, which with its two-cylinder engine, cardan shaft drive, and worm gearing looks excellent value for the money, and as its weight complete is only about 6 cwt. its running charges should certainly not be heavy.

New Cars and New Models.

As regards new cars of higher power, one which is sure to interest many, and which also comes within the category of the cheap car, is a new American importation, the Overland—a thoroughly up-to-date production, with live axle drive, thermo-syphon cooling, automatic lubrication, etc., which is offered at very reasonable rates—a 15-20-h.p. two-seater for £220, a 20-25-h.p. four-seater, with side entrance body, for £275, and so on.

Noticeable, also, is the number of six-cylinder cars of moderate power now to be obtained. Formerly the six-cylinder engine was associated only with leviathans. To-day this is no longer the case, and "sixes" rated in the twenties are now made by several firms—such as the 20-h.p. Talbot (a fine car, which made its début last year), the 23-h.p. Arrol-Johnston, the 29-h.p. Crowdy (with Hewitt piston valve engine), the 20-30-h.p. Hotchkiss, a splendidly designed car well worth attention, and the 30-h.p. Vauxhall—another very attractive model. Six-cylinders of larger growth include a 45-h.p. Sunbeam, a 35-h.p. Alldays, and a 50-h.p. Wolseley, which may be pronounced unhesitatingly one of the finest cars in the whole show. This is the type of car which has recently been supplied by the Wolseley Company to Queen Alexandra, and in point alike of its beautiful design and superb workmanship it certainly does them credit. Another splendid six-cylinder of high power is the new 38-h.p. Lanchester, which, without departing in any essential respect from the standard Lanchester practice, is distinguished, as usual, by its clever and original details.

Some of the best-known firms are making no alterations whatever this year in either their designs or their ratings. The 1911 Renaults, for instance, will be just the same as those of 1910, and practically the same applies in the case of the Rolls-Royce, Talbot, Iris, B.S.A., and several other well-known cars. On the whole, this indicates a healthy state of things, in so far as it goes to suggest that something very like perfection has been reached on existing lines. If a firm like Messrs. Clément-Talbot, for instance, make no alterations, it is simply because they can see no possible room for further improvement.

Engines.

As regards the motors themselves, the most significant tendency is that already noted in the direction of lengthened stroke, accompanied in some cases by diminished bore as well. The new Treasury scale has, of course, been partly the cause of this, and it is clear, in certain cases that designers have worked with one eye on Whitehall. Thus, in the case of a new 12-h.p. Daimler (not shown at Olympia) the bore is 69 mm.; if it had been 70 mm. the licence fee would have been four guineas instead of three guineas, and the gain in power would certainly not have been appreciable. But, apart from this special cause, strokes have, of course, been lengthening for years past, and makers nowadays are surprised merely that it took them so long to discover what an amount of power they threw away formerly. Ratios as high as 2½ to 1 are, it is said, being adopted by some of the modern French designers, but we have not got so far over here at present, though we are certainly progressing in that direction.

Cooling.

The steady increase in the number of cars cooled on the thermo-syphon principle will appeal favourably to many. Humbers, Martinis, Arrol-Johnstons, Lorraine-Diétrichs, and Thames cars all supply instances. The new 30-h.p. six-cylinder Vauxhall also relies on the same system, as does the new 15-h.p. Napier, though provision is made in the case of the latter by means of a capped opening in the crank chamber for fitting a pump should this be found necessary in tropical climates. This is a move in the right direction, and it is not perhaps a very rash prediction that eventually water circulating pumps will be universally done away with.

In the case of the 14-16-h.p. Grégoire the plan has been adopted of fitting a fan not only behind the radiator, but in the fly-wheel as well, the 15-h.p. Itala employing a like arrangement.

Carburation.

In the matter of carburetters no very striking developments are to be recorded, doubtless because the best carburetters at present on the market come so very near to perfection. The Claudel-Hobson continues to find wide favour, this make being employed on a large number of cars. The more thorough heating of the mixture is the object of many small improvements to be noted under this head. Thus in the case of the new six-cylinder 18-22-h.p. Sunbeam the mixing pipe above the jet is not only hot-water-jacketed externally, but heated internally also by means of four copper cross-tubes inserted so as to intercept the mixture on its way to the cylinders—an ingenious device.

In the case of the new 20-30 h.p. six-cylinder Hotchkiss the same effect is aimed at by passing the gases through internally cast passages in the cylinder heads to the valves. An ingenious carburetter on individual lines is that employed on the 15-h.p. Napier cars. It would take too much space to describe it here, but it is well worth examination, not the least of its merits being the fact that it has neither moving parts, valves, nor springs to need adjustment or get out of order.

Valves.

In the matter of valves the extended adoption of the sliding sleeve variety is not to be overlooked. Daimlers no longer stand alone in this respect. Minervas were the first to follow their example and to adopt the Knight valve, and Rovers were quick on their heels. To them has now to be added firms of such credit and renown as Messrs. Panhard in France and the great Cannstadt firm which produces the far-famed Mercédès cars in Germany. In the face of such triumphs the mercurial Mr. Knight may well snap his fingers at envious rivals (as he considers them, of course) who still stick to what he regards as the obsolete, or at least obsolescent, poppet type, and who say disrespectful things of his own vaunted substitute.

Seriously, it is not to be denied that since it was originally brought out the Knight valve has emphatically made good its claims to respect, even though it does not necessarily follow that the downfall of its older rival is at hand. On the contrary, it is probable that, as each has its advantages, so both will continue to be employed according to the taste and judgment of designers. But one thing at least is certain. Those critics have unquestionably been proved wrong who, on the introduction of the Knight valve, demonstrated so conclusively on theoretical grounds that it could never work.

Ignition.

In common with every other detail, ignition arrangements have been improved out of knowledge during the last few years, one result of which is to be seen in the growing tendency to rely on magneto alone. Some cautious souls would doubtless be disposed to regard this as a hazardous practice, but the absolute reliability of good magneto ignition nowadays doubtless justifies it. Moreover, it is argued that a supplementary ignition is very liable itself to get out of order, for the simple reason that it is so seldom used. This is the view adopted by the Clément Company, who make the further suggestion that if a secondary system is considered indispensable the best plan is to carry a spare magneto ready timed, which can be fitted in a few minutes.

Other cars besides Clément relying on magneto alone include Lorraine-Diétrichs, Vauxhalls, Belsizes, and many other well-known makes; but by the majority alternative systems are still maintained, while I notice that in one case at least—namely, that of the new 16-h.p. Minerva—dual ignition is now being fitted instead of single, as hitherto.

Transmission.

Under this heading the extending favour bestowed on worm drive is one of the outstanding features of the show. This is one of several instances in the case of which Lanchester practice has led the way, and it must be a source of gratification to Mr. F. W. Lanchester to note how many other designers are now coming round to his way of thinking in this matter. Daimlers and Dennis cars remain faithful, of course, while others now also to be numbered among the "wormites" include Deasys, Sunbeams, and Vulcans, and, in some models, Argylls, Rovers, Singers, Standards, and Wolseleys as well. It does not follow, of course, that the days of the bevel drive are numbered, for many engineers of the highest eminence hold the view that it gives more power, without necessarily any greater noisiness, than the worm; but the tendency is certainly significant.

De Dion Changes.

In the same connection the noble army of De Dion users will note with interest that the well-known and exceedingly efficient plate clutch of this firm has undergone a certain amount of modification—the clutch now consisting of a central plate with leather riveted on both sides, which plate is gripped between the front plate of the clutch and a movable plate on the rear side kept up to its work by a single helical spring encircling the clutch shaft. Messrs. De Dion do not make alterations without good cause, and doubtless the new clutch will be even more satisfactory than the old one.

A rear axle of an unusual type is to be observed on one of the Vinot cars. In this case the crown bevel instead of being in the rear axle is mounted on a short counter-shaft ahead of and parallel with the axle. In the centre of this shaft is a spur pinion in gear with a larger spur pinion replacing the bevel gear usually employed. It is claimed that this gives, along with a double reduction, a specially robust rear axle of low weight suitable for heavy cars geared low.

The practice of sloping engine and gear-box for the purpose of reducing the angle of the propeller-shaft universal joint seems to be growing, and is one to be commended as being calculated to minimise wear of that hardworking member, and at the same time to promote the efficiency of the drive.

Friction and Belt Drives.

Of course, one or two friction-driven cars are shown, for no motor exhibition has been complete without them any time these ten years past and more. The odd thing is that so little is ever heard of them during the intervening twelve months. Hope springs eternal, however, and each succeeding November friction-drive enthusiasts are bidden to believe that at length the problem has been solved and that a completely satisfactory friction-drive transmission has at last been evolved, but, so far, these fond hopes still await materialisation.

A novelty of another type in the present show is a car going back to what is also a friction drive of a sort—namely, one achieved through the agency of a belt. Here is a resuscitation indeed. If there is one feature more than another which is regarded nowadays as connoting all that is antiquated in motor engineering it is the belt drive, which carries the mind back at once to the days of tube ignition, unequal-sized wheels, dog-cart bodies, and all the other characteristics of the aboriginal autocar. It needed some boldness, therefore, to revive such a method of transmission. It is declared however, that in its modernised form the system has none of its former defects while possessing many solid advantages entitling it to consideration. The car in question is one of 12-15 h.p. called the Pilot.

Accessibility.

An important matter to all owners, especially those who look after their own cars, is that of accessibility, though it is one in regard to which many designers even still are strangely indifferent. Yet enormous improvements have been effected in this respect during recent years, and the present exhibition provides many instances of still further efforts in the right direction.

Facilities for inspecting internal parts without taking a car to pieces are provided, for instance, to an increasing extent all round. Thus, in the case of the 20-h.p. Adler, an exceedingly well-designed car throughout, the leather-faced clutch employed is so designed that the whole of the clutch mechanism can be dismounted by removing two sets of bolts, and removed without disturbing any other unit.

In the 25-h.p. Vinot the back axle has been similarly designed to admit of the differential gear and bevel pinion being withdrawn through the axle casing without touching the road wheels at all. Somewhat the same arrangement is adopted in the case of the 15-h.p. Valveless, the driving bevel and its ball bearings being carried in the shell of the back axle, so that they can be withdrawn as a single unit without any difficulty.

In the new 29-h.p. six-cylinder Crowdy car quite an exceptional degree of accessibility has been aimed at. Thus, any one of the pistons can be removed in a few minutes, and the bearings can be got at equally easily for the purpose of examination or repair without removing the engine from the chassis or taking off the undershield.

Frames.

Under this head new features do not appear to be very numerous. It may be noted, however, that a somewhat bold practice has been adopted in the case of the new six-cylinder 20-30-h.p. Hotchkiss in dispensing with both torque and radius rods, the springs being designed to take all the strains. This procedure gives a very clean appearance to the rear part of the chassis, but it is one which will doubtless cause some shaking of heads on the score that with springs sufficiently robust to fulfil a dual function in this way the quality of the suspension must be to some extent affected, though the makers in this particular case aver, of course, that this is not the fact.

A fine piece of work is the pressed steel frame of the new 15-h.p. Darracq, in the case of which the same plan has been followed as that adopted on the 14-16-h.p. model of the same company last year—the frame, sub-frame, and under-shield being all in one piece, and thereby making for the maximum degree of combined lightness and strength. Wire wheels, it may be noted, seem to be steadily increasing in popularity, many makers now fitting them as standard, Messrs. Humber having been one of the latest to adopt this course. Probably they will become universal eventually, since there is no question as to their being at once stronger and lighter.

Brakes.

Brakes are an all-important detail, but there is not much scope for innovations here. It may, however, be observed that front-wheel braking seems to be gradually gaining ground. Messrs. Arrol-Johnston adopted the system last year, and they are retaining it again this time, though, in deference to the views of those who are still sceptical on the subject, they now offer a brake on the counter-shaft instead, if this be preferred. At the same time they are careful to explain that this implies no sort of doubt on their own part as to the superiority of the newer practice, which, they assert, has given complete satisfaction during the last twelve months.

Another car employing front-wheel braking for the first time this year is the 15-h.p. Thames, the system adopted bearing all the appearance of having been particularly well thought out. In the case of the Crossley cars, which adopted it for the first time last year, the system employed has been considerably altered in the new season's models.

Bodies.

In the matter of bodies, the popularity of the torpedo type is still manifest, but signs are not wanting at the same time of a disposition to revolt against some of the more extravagant tendencies under this head, and to get back to more normal and, be it added, more comfortable and convenient lines. It has not taken long to realise in practice that the torpedo sometimes sacrifices a good deal of utility to supposed smartness of appearance, and while the flush-sided body continues to hold its own the claims of utility in the matter of accommodation for luggage and accessories are not quite so ruthlessly sacrificed as hitherto. There is no doubt, in fact, that there is room for very general improvement as regards the provision of luggage accommodation on most modern cars.

One of the Argyll models shows how much more might be done in this way. Here you have, in addition to a set of trunks sufficient for a whole party supported on a grid, a separate trunk for ladies' hats, and other lockers elsewhere for coats, umbrellas, mackintoshes, etc. A car so fitted contrasts sharply with some of the two-seated bodies to be seen on the road nowadays, affording scarcely room for a spare tin of petrol. It is indeed astonishing that, out of a foolish desire to present a sporting appearance, some owners can sacrifice their comfort to such an extent as they do.

Closed Cars.

In the way of closed cars, one specially worth inspection is the new patent Cabriolet shown by Messrs. Morgan and Co., the well-known coachbuilders, of Long Acre and Old Bond Street, many of whose other exhibits, including their wind-screens and Cape hoods, deserve more than passing notice.

An undesirable feature associated with the closed body has always been its tendency to excessive noise, consequent on reverberation from the roof and sides, and in the case of cars habitually used for long journeys the consideration is one of some importance. In the Pullmann limousine, shown by Messrs. Austin, an attempt has been made to procure the maximum of quietness by the provision of a leather roof, with a strengthened portion for the carriage of luggage in the middle.

A Daimler Innovation.

The increasing tendency to fit high side doors to the front seats is one obviously to be commended. It is astonishing, indeed, that cars have been made for so long without such obvious aids to the comfort of the driver and his companion.

An innovation adopted by the Daimler Company on their 23-h.p. six-cylinder model is worth inspection. At the rear of the engine there is affixed to the frame a stout tubular arch, to which is attached on the front side the rear end of the bonnet, and on the back the switch, gauges, and other necessary dashboard fittings. These, therefore, remain always in position as a part of the chassis, while permitting the remainder of the dashboard to be removed with the rest of the body when it is desired to get at the chassis alone. The idea is as simple as it is ingenious, and it has been carried out in a very workmanlike manner.

Miscellaneous.

The modern owner is an exacting person, and makers strive more and more, as time runs on, to meet individual requirements in ways unthought of a few years ago. On the 12-h.p. Humber, for instance, the pedal of the foot throttle is made so that it can be exactly adjusted to the individual driver's reach. On one of the Sheffield-Simplex cars there is a neat device for adjusting the tension of the fan belt by hand. An arrangement adopted by the makers of the Grégoire cars might well be more generally followed—namely, the provision of a float to indicate the amount of oil in the crank case. In the case of the 14-20-h.p. Leon-Bollée car—a beautifully designed vehicle, worthy of its historic name—provision is made for fitting the petrol tank either under the driver's seat or behind the dash, as the purchaser may desire.

The Coming of Self-starting.

While, however, in this respect, and that all sorts of improvements making for the greater comfort and convenience of the driver are to be welcomed, one reform tarries for which we have already waited too long. It is amazing that the most costly and luxurious cars should still be provided with no better means of setting the engine in motion than the primitive device of turning a handle in front of the bonnet. Mechanical starting devices there are in plenty, of course, but it is still the rarest thing to encounter one in actual use. Yet nothing can be more certain than that motorists of the future will look back with amazement to the days when we were content with the existing clumsy arrangement. A few years hence the car which cannot be started from the driver's seat will probably be regarded as nothing but a relic of the Dark Ages. We are so accustomed to it that the absurdity of the existing system is hardly realised by many. Let it be noted, however, as a promise of better things, that there are at least two or three cars now made whose mechanism comprises a self-starting arrangement. One, for instance, is the 22-h.p. S.C.A.T., while others are new Simms and Adams models, and also a new car made by the Cowey Engineering Company. Other makers, please copy.

Tyres.

Tyres are at once the bugbear and the necessity of the motorist. They are equally irritating and indispensable. The weakest feature of the modern car, they are also its most essential component. They are the most exasperating factor in automobilism, and also the most wonderful. Some day, perhaps, we shall go down to Olympia and find on view at last that ideally resilient non-puncturable tyre which has been the dream of inventors since motoring began; but at present all that can be said is that the dream has still to be realised. On their present lines, however, tyres have improved enormously during recent years. Experience teaches and practice makes perfect, and the tyre companies have exemplified the truth of both adages.

Some Dunlop Features.

All the leading makers are represented, of course, at Olympia, headed by the Dunlop Tyre Company, the doyen of them all, who have a splendid show of tyres of all types. The Dunlop detachable rim and the Dunlop detachable wheel are also to be seen, both in a slightly improved form, while among the accessories shown are specimens of the excellent new repair patches which the company have recently brought out and of their useful security bolt protectors.

The Dunlop Company has also taken up the new tyre filling Pfleumatic—a fact certainly to be accounted a feather in the cap of the owners of that compound, of which a good deal is likely to be heard in the future.

Other Firms.

Other leading firms represented are the Continental Tyre and Rubber Company, the Michelin Tyre Company, the Palmer Tyre Company, and a dozen or so more, not overlooking the makers of the Goodrich tyres, which have recently "come on" greatly. This company sets special store by its all-rubber non-skids, which it maintains to be almost as efficient as the metal studded type, and to give, at the same time, extraordinary wear.

The Avon is another tyre which has steadily improved its position during recent years, and which, though its output is, I suppose, nothing like that of some of the larger companies, now ranks with the best, none the less, in point of quality.

Wheels.

In the way of detachable wheels, spring wheels, and the like there is a good display, though, so far as I have observed, nothing much in the way of novelty. The Rudge-Whitworth detachable wheel, for instance, whose popularity is unrivalled, remains absolutely unchanged. Now that the question of resilient wheels is so much to the fore, in view of the proposed R.A.C. trial, the various examples of this kind of wheel on view will doubtless come in for special attention.

Accessories.

To the average visitor to Olympia the accessory section is probably the most useful and attractive portion of the whole show. It is not every motorist who goes to the exhibition with the intention of buying a six-cylinder Napier or a 40-h.p. Mercédès. A large majority have their cars already, and do not propose to change them. One and all, however, are interested in accessories and minor aids to comfort of one sort and another, and ready to invest in anything in this way that takes their fancy. In the gallery at Olympia may be seen every sort of sundry which the heart of the motorist can desire, ranging in price from a few pence to many pounds.

An interesting self-starter is that exhibited by the Cowey Engineering Company, well-known otherwise in connection with their patent pneumatic suspension, and now showing also a car of their own. In the case of the self-starter a powerful spring is used to store the requisite energy, and this on being released turns the engine shaft eight times, which should suffice to start any engine in proper order, and then the engine itself winds the spring up again for use another time.

"Everything but the motor" is the well-known catch-phrase of Messrs. Dunhill, and the briefest glance at their comprehensive display is sufficient to attest its appropriateness. Among other things they show a horn of the three-noted type called the "Automisca," which looks like a useful article; any of the three notes can be sounded at will by slightly altering the position of the bulb.

An ingenious instrument shown by Messrs. Elliott Bros. is the Wimperis accelerometer, the use of which is not merely to measure, as its name implies, the rate of acceleration, but also the rate of retardation, frictional resistance when coasting, brake horse-power, etc., while in a modified form it serves further as a gradometer.

Messrs. Harvey Frost show, as usual, their H.F. vulcaniser, which enables every owner to do his own tyre repairs as well as the makers themselves, if he goes to work in the right way, at a practically nominal cost.

Another vulcaniser worth attention is that shown by Messrs. Lacoste, called the Vulcan. This is of exceedingly ingenious construction, and in its working it is alleged to be as efficient as it is simple. "You press the button, we do the rest," has apparently been the method of working aimed at, and in the result the operator can hardly go wrong if he tries.

Two New Magnetos.

On the stand of the United Motor Industries, Limited, the Mea magneto is an exhibit of interest. Indeed, it is a magneto of which a good deal more is likely to be heard in due course. Its design is, in many respects, original and distinctive, and the result is said to be an exceptional degree of efficiency combined with great reliability and splendid wearing qualities. Mercédès cars are now fitted with these magnetos.

The new two-spark magneto, by means of which two sets of sparking-plugs are served simultaneously, shown by the Bosch Magneto Company, is another ingenious ignition development which should not be missed.

The Liquale petrol filler is one of many useful articles shown by Messrs. Brown Bros. which will appeal to many.

And these are only some of the innumerable useful sundries of one sort and another which might be referred to.

DO WIVES RECEIVE FAIR TREATMENT?

ARE THE MAJORITY OF MEN INHERENTLY AND ALTOGETHER SELFISH?

One wants to think well of human nature, and would like to answer the second query in the negative, but what are the facts? Let us apply the most lenient test—may we not reasonably expect that whatever of unselfishness and generosity there is in a man will come to the surface in his treatment of the one whom he has chosen for his life companion and helpmeet?

Wives' Interest.

And yet the briefest consideration will convince us that a very large percentage of husbands are careful of the wife's interest only where and in so far as her comfort and happiness contribute to his own. It is a hard saying, and requires strong proof, for do not most men share almost everything with their wives, and spend much on their personal adornment and their daily pleasures? True; but this, taken alone, is no test—it may be only another form of selfishness, being essential to his own enjoyment. He spends money on his wife's adornment just as he does on his pictures and statuary.

Does the Husband Make Sacrifices?

The true test is—to what extent is he willing to make sacrifices for her welfare only, as apart from his own? In the few cases where the income is largely or wholly from the wife's side she is generally ready and anxious to make almost any sacrifice to insure a continuation of the whole or a large part to the husband should he survive her. Can as much be said for the husband? In life's partnership nature and custom have placed him in a very advantageous position. The income is generally from his side, and is of such a nature that it ceases with his death. Surely if he were half as generous and unselfish as he believes himself to be he would take immediate steps to secure at least a third or a quarter of this income to his wife in the event of her surviving him. Have any large percentage of husbands done this? Thousands, enjoying good incomes, have made no such provision beyond a few hundred or a thousand pounds of life assurance. The latter sum, invested at, say, 4 per cent., will bring the wife £40 yearly to take the place of an income of perhaps £500 to £1,000.

Almost Criminal Neglect.

Is it not a pretty small and mean provision for her whom he has perhaps taken from a luxurious home and promised to cherish and protect? Such neglect is not British fair play—it is almost criminal.

Should a man with an income of, say, £600 a year not see to it that his wife is definitely secured at least £200 yearly should she survive him? To do this by a policy of ordinary life insurance would perhaps be somewhat expensive, but there is now a new, cheaper, and altogether better method, viz., income insurance.

A Permanent Income.

With ordinary life assurance, in order to provide a permanent income, the principal must be invested, and at the rate of interest now obtainable on good securities a large amount of principal is required to produce a satisfactory income. Moreover, the income may at any time fail if the investment turns out badly. With income insurance all this trouble and risk is obviated. The insurance society, if desired, takes the place of the trustee, and pays the income direct to the beneficiary yearly, half-yearly, or quarterly, as long as she survives. Thus a man, say thirty-five, earning £600 a year, having a wife about the same age, may have one-sixth of this income (£100 a year) guaranteed to his wife for life, should she survive him, for a yearly payment of about £25. Other amounts in proportion.

Provision for Children and Old Age.

If there are also children to provide for, the payment of a small additional premium will secure the continuation of the income for twenty years certain, and for as long thereafter as the wife may live. Thus, even if the wife should not survive the twenty years period, the youngest child will have about attained his majority before the income ceases.

One may also have included in this policy a provision for his own and his wife's declining years. For example, in the case cited a slightly larger payment will, in addition to all the other benefits, secure to the husband at the age of sixty £100 a year, to continue as long as either he or his wife may live, and in any event for twenty years. In fact, there is scarcely any limit to the various provisions for a guaranteed income that may be included in these Income Policies.

These policies also furnish a very convenient method of making provision for one's parents. For example, a young man of 25 wishing to secure £100 a year to his mother should she survive him would only be required to pay a premium of £7 8s. per annum.

Some very interesting leaflets on this subject are issued by the Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, Norfolk Street, Strand, one of the pioneers in this form of insurance, a company always in the van of progress, as might be expected from an institution cradled in that land of progress and prosperity. The Company's balance-sheet for 1909 shows it to be possessed of great financial strength. The funds amount to over £6,500,000. All Canadian companies are under the strictest Government supervision, and on the very high standard of solvency applied by the Canadian Government the surplus of this Company over all liabilities and capital stock is more than £1,000,000. As a further guarantee of all its obligations in the United Kingdom the Company has put up a permanent trust deposit of £100,000 in securities with the Bank of Scotland in the names of the Right Hon. the Earl of Albemarle and the Right Hon. Sir Charles Dalrymple, Bart, P.C., as trustees.

The Company was established in 1865 by special Act of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, and for about 20 years has been transacting a prosperous and steadily-increasing business in the United Kingdom. It is worthy of every confidence. Special attention is directed to the Company's announcement which appears below.

should resign, but the shareholders had sent in an overwhelming majority of proxies in favour of his re-election, and he felt it his duty to remain at his post.

Sir Ernest Spencer, D.L., seconded the motion.

A long discussion followed, in the course of which Mr. Lea-Smith expressed sympathy with the directors in the great difficulties which, owing to severe competition, they had had to face. In view of the circumstances, the fact that the company were able to present such a balance-sheet was extremely satisfactory. He considered that the company were giving very good value for money, and thought that it might be advisable in some instances to increase the charge made for their commodities. Agitation, he contended, would not advance their interests; on the contrary, it would in all probability do the reverse, and he recommended that the shareholders should have confidence in the present board.

Mr. Pownall said he did not share Mr. Edwards's optimistic views of the prosperity of the company. The plain issue which he desired to put before the meeting was the re-election or not of Mr. Edwards, in whose place he should propose the election of Earl Russell.

Earl Russell said that he had followed this agitation as a shareholder with interest, but had taken no active part in it. He had consented to be nominated as a director only on the condition that it was the general wish of the shareholders that he should act.

Eventually the report was adopted with practical unanimity.

The two retiring directors—Mr. Edwards and Mr. Mitchell—were re-elected. Earl Russell's nomination was withdrawn, and Mr. Killingworth Hedges, who, on a show of hands, was elected over Mr. Mitchell, intimated that he would not go to a poll, but would offer himself as a candidate next year.

It was stated that the board had received proxies representing 48,483 shares, and that Messrs. Pownall and Penn had lodged proxies for 22,637 shares.

LA LIBERTAD RUBBER.

The statutory meeting of the La Libertad Rubber and Cocoa Estate Co., Limited, was held yesterday, at the registered offices of the company, 1, East India Avenue, E.C., Sir Thomas Barclay, M.P., chairman of the company, presiding.

The notice calling the meeting having been read by the representative of the secretaries (Messrs. J. A. Henderson and Co., Limited),

The Chairman said: The object of this meeting is to present the report that you have all received. The company was registered on July 20, 1910, with a nominal capital of £60,000, divided into 120,000 shares of 10s. each. Sir Wm. Crossley, Bart., M.P., guaranteed 70,000 shares for a commission of 7½ per cent., and the directors went to allotment on that number, the balance of the 50,000 shares were allotted to the vendor in part-payment of the purchase consideration. Therefore, the whole of the authorised capital is now issued. Sir Wm. Crossley applied for and has been allotted for cash, 36,714 shares, the calls on which he has fully paid. This, added to his holding of 50,000 shares allotted in part payment of the estates, shows that he holds a considerable financial interest in the company, an interest exceeding 70 per cent. of the entire capital. The total of calls in arrear on the date at which the statutory statement was made up was £2,436 12s. 6d., equal to less than 7 per cent. on the public issue, and a great part of the arrears has now been received. Our cash resources are made up as follows:—Remittance to estate, £500; loan at short notice bearing 6 per cent. interest, £3,500; at bank on deposit bearing interest at usual rates, £4,500; on current account, £2,677; calls in arrear. The whole of this amount is expected to be paid this month, £2,437, making a total of £13,614, which your directors consider sufficient working capital for some considerable time. You will notice that we have an additional member to our board. This gentleman, Mr. T. Hewitt Myring, we were glad to elect to the board as the nominee of the vendor, who had the right to appoint one director under the agreement of sale. Your board has had a great deal of initial work to do. An expert and a manager had to be chosen and sent out with the necessary equipment. In Col. De Hora we have an expert in both rubber and timber and one who is also a qualified mining engineer. He will at once proceed to have the property registered in the company's name, and attend to any legal matters connected therewith. As manager, the directors have appointed Mr. W. F. Mackenzie. He has had considerable experience in South America, and the directors assured themselves that he is a thoroughly competent man. Col. De Hora and Mr. Mackenzie will co-operate in opening out the estate and starting the exploitation of our property. It is premature to speak of the prospects of the estate, but, as you know, the vendor has guaranteed a dividend of 6 per cent. for the first year, to be paid in two instalments—viz., the first half on January 31 and the second half on July 31; this will give us the necessary time to proceed with the careful and scientific development of the company's varied resources. It was alleged in some portions of the Press, when our issue was before the public, that our statements were based on reports fifteen or seventeen years old. Far from this being the case, every word of the prospectus was carefully checked by the directors from reports set out in the prospectus dated as late as April of this year. The other communications referred to in the prospectus were of a general character, and only interesting as such. However, if there is any shareholder present who wishes for further information, or to ask any question, I will be pleased to give any particulars at my disposal. It will interest you to hear that we have received the following joint cable from Messrs. De Hora and W. F. Mackenzie:—"Arrived at destination. Land appears to be very suitable. Have not been able yet to investigate the approximate number rubber and cocoa trees."

A vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. Plackitt, and seconded by Mr. William Godsell, terminated the proceedings.

QUEER STORY.

OUT OF THE MOUTHS OF BABES.

"POUF!" said Monsieur the Professor. His forehead was high, and a phalanx of letters made an imposing tail to his name. "I am on the brink, I say—on the brink! To-morrow the world shall know that the problem of the ages is to all intents and purposes solved. My friend, I have imprisoned the—shall I call it for your benefit the gas?—the gas that is behind every scientific mystery. I have challenged the Atmosphere and the atmosphere has replied to my challenge. I have driven the Atom back upon itself. We shall shortly be able to divide and subdivide that which has so entirely baffled us hitherto. . . . To-morrow, when my little test tube has cooled—it stands now on my laboratory table—so simple in outward seeming, so tremendous, so unthinkably momentous in its possibilities, I shall be able to separate this gas, which I have named psuchidum, from the liquid."

"And, roughly, your theory will be ——?" inquired the Englishman, who stalked at his side.

"My theory will be—providing my demonstration is successful—that this psuchidum, the component parts of which I shall be able to exactly tabulate, has existed from all time; chaos, in fact, was but another word for it. It surged about in the luminous ether till it found a denseness or scantiness of that ether exactly suitable to its purpose, and it generated first a formless something, and then a world—then all worlds with their infinite complexity."

"And this process has been going on from all time, and will go on to all time?"

"Precisely."

Their walk had taken them into the rosery (the Professor was one of the most successful rose-growers in France), where little Estelle, the gardener's daughter, was busy with a pair of scissors, clipping off dead roses, and bestowing them in a red and yellow basket.

The Englishman asked a question.

"It has taken years of research to find the exact substances, and the exact proportion of the substances which have yielded this discovery, eh?"

"It has taken thirty years," the Professor told him—"the best part of one's life. I have travelled to such uncivilised portions of the earth as would alarm a practised explorer. I have been many times in peril of my life. In Central Africa, for instance, when I required a peculiar ore, obtainable only in the bed of one small river—I seized a little lump amid a shower of arrows from the natives—only one little lump; but it was priceless."

"Without swamping me with technicalities," inquired the Englishman, "you have, as I take it, re-created the Creator?"

"I believe so; to-morrow we shall know."

Little Estelle's eyes were round—her mouth was very wide open. Monsieur the Professor had not noticed her. Behold a calamity! He never failed to pinch her cheeks as a rule. Moreover, Monsieur the Professor, who could tell such charming stories if he would, and make the roses come alive and chatter, was talking nonsense—very stupid nonsense to-day. Behold an occasion for tears! Little Estelle dropped two upon a Gloire de Dijon.

"Then," said the Englishman, slowly—very slowly—seeming to ponder sadly on the matter, "you have lost—God?"

The Professor thrust out his lean hands as one who dismisses something or someone; and as he passed from the rosery and out of ear-shot he repeated, but sadly, too, "Yes—I have lost God."

. . . . . .

"Yes, I have lost God."

The little Estelle understood that at any rate. She murmured it to herself several times: "Oui, je l'ai perdu, le Dieu."

Was it astonishing, therefore, that Monsieur the Professor had not stayed to pinch her cheeks or pull her curls and call them elfin bells, or laugh and pretend to find little people among the rose petals?

He had lost God! Little Estelle shut her round black eyes tight, and made a desperate effort to fancy the abysmal tragedy of it. The reflections led her into labyrinths which would have made far wiser heads dizzy. She emerged quite pale, but very determined. She left the roses—she left the little red and yellow basket lying on its side, and went as fast as her sabots and short grey stockinged legs would carry her, home. It was dinner time when she arrived. She said nothing to her father (who was a widower) on this immense theme—somehow it was too immense and she could not. She pondered and pondered till her brain whizzed.

At last her father, losing patience, chided her. "Nom du chien," said he, "what foolishness is this—eat thy good soup, and think of the many who need it." But the soup had no taste in it. The mignonette in the window had no smell. Even her father's upbraiding had no meaning and did not move her, and all because the Professor had lost God. . . .

It was, while she played with her saveloy, pretending to nibble it, that the inspiration arrived. The little Estelle went hot and cold, but she did not doubt that her kind friend Saint John had sent it her, and it must be acted upon.

After dinner she closed her very regular teeth on her red lower lip, climbed to her garret, and, standing on her bed, she reached with hands that trembled and shook and felt feverish for her treasure—the thing she loved best in the world.

"Yes, I have lost God." Only these words ringing in her ears nerved her for the task she had set herself. The Professor was her kindest friend. She loved him—therefore no wrench was too painful to make for his sake. But oh! some wrenches are unspeakable. . . .

The little Estelle did not enter the house of Monsieur the Professor by legitimate means, for she stood in constant dread of Madame Dandeau, the housekeeper. Instead, leaving her sabots on a flower-bed hidden beneath the ample leaves of a cluster of peonies, she watched her opportunity. Fate, in the shape of a bonfire, which kept her father chained to the kitchen garden, and some very tough ivy clinging to the most sequestered corner of the house, aided her. She climbed the ivy, for she was small and light and agile, and passed into a half-open window. How she panted when she stood safely in the queer carpetless apartment, where innumerable bottles were ranged, and curious and uninteresting appliances foregathered. Somehow she could believe that it was not so difficult to lose God here as out in the yellow sunshine among the carnations and anemones.

If it had not been that Monsieur the Professor was so merry and charming—that Monsieur the Professor loved little girls—that Monsieur the Professor knew such a host or stories—Estelle would have turned tail even now.

Tears welled into her eyes as she took a sudden agonised farewell—such a farewell as seemed the dividing asunder of joints and sinews. She pressed a kiss reverently upon the something which she had carried in her pinafore, and placed it on the table propped against what looked like a tiny glass vase of water. With a lingering backward glance and a curtsey, the little Estelle stole towards the window—one of her grey-stockinged legs was already over the sill, when a small crash made her look round. The tiny vase of water had toppled over; Estelle returned and mopped it up with the corner of her pinafore. After all it was only water—and nothing was spoiled. Then she laid the little empty vase down and stole away. There was no need to worry, for, after all, what is a trickle of water that one should disturb oneself?

And then the little Estelle climbed down the ivy.

"I cannot understand you great men," said the Englishman, almost irritably, the next morning. "The labour of thirty years is spoilt; an experiment of intense vital importance to the world falls through; the stream of speculation, wisdom, theorisation which has agitated your brain for years is rudely dammed, and you look less upset than when you found Camille had overboiled your breakfast egg."

The Professor's lean fingers reached to his hair and pushed it back from his forehead; it was a movement that, with him, usually signified relief.

"Your Danish King Canute," said he, "pretended to set bounds to the sea, to teach his fulsome Court a lesson, eh?"

"Yes."

"I have not pretended. I believed it was possible to set bounds to something greater than the sea, but——"

"Well?" said the Englishman.

"But it isn't." The Professor crossed the room, and re-crossed it to lay a hand on the Englishman's shoulder.

"Come into the laboratory," said he.

So they went together.

The Professor, stooping over the table, whereon lay a heterogeneous collection of instruments, great and small, lifted up two things.

One was an empty test-tube, the other a crucifix.

The figure of Christ, fashioned in cream Plaster of Paris, hung with bowed head upon an ebony cross.

"But how—what———?" the Englishman frowned in astonishment, and, lifting a finger, touched the crucifix reverently.

"I know no more than you," the Professor told him, "nor shall I inquire."

"But your wasted years?" the Englishman lamented. "You will begin to collect your materials afresh at once? It will be easier the second time."

The Professor shook his head.

"What shall you do?" The Englishman grew impatient.

The Professor hung the crucifix on to a jutting nail immediately over the table where his greatest experiments had been made.

"'So far shalt thou go, and no farther.'" he quoted. "I shall go back to my roses."

BOOKS.

MESSRS. BLAND AND BACKHOUSE'S "China Under the Empress Dowager" (1) is the most interesting, instructive, and amazing book upon the internal and external politics of the Celestial Empire that has appeared at least in our generation. Perhaps the moral that will remain in most minds of the career of this masterful woman is contained in her last words:

> Never again allow any woman to hold the supreme power in the State; it is against the house-law of our dynasty and should be strictly forbidden. Be careful not to permit eunuchs to meddle in Government matters. The Ming Dynasty was brought to ruin by eunuchs, and its fate should be a warning to my people.

Nearly all the crimes and calamities of her disastrous reign were due either to the feminine narrowness of her outlook and to the feminine fitfulness and spitefulness of her temper, or to the baleful influence of her chief eunuch, Li Lien-ying. To speak of the Empress Dowager, as our authors occasionally do, as an Eastern Queen Elizabeth is absurd, since her rule was even more disastrous to China than the Virgin Queen's was to the glory and aggrandisement of England; while, on the other hand, Tzu Hsi had none of Elizabeth's vanity, pettiness, and amenability to flattery. In a word, the Empress Dowager was as superior as a woman as she was inferior as a queen to Elizabeth. Her greatness was relative chiefly.

Amongst the effete classical scholars, the fat-paunched Falstaffs, the opium sots, doddering fatalists and corrupt parasites of the Imperial clans she seems, indeed, to have been an anachronism, a "cast-back" to the virility and energy that won China for her sturdy ancestors. She appeared to be the born and inevitable ruler of the degenerate dynasty, and, if she became a law unto herself, it was largely because there were few about her fit to lead or to command.

She was a child, and a spoiled child, amongst children, and the superior of her childish subjects only or chiefly in decision and masterfulness. Nothing shows this more clearly than her infantile despatches to the Emperors of Russia and Japan and to the Queen of England, written in the hope of blinding their respective countries to her participation in the Boxer outrages. As our authors say, these despatches are almost inconceivably puerile, and it is the very puerility of Chinese diplomacy which puzzles Western Talleyrands.

The very kindergarten element in Chinese politics is a stumbling-block to the elaborate and highly specialised machinery of European diplomacy, which, being at a loss how to deal with the suspiciously transparent artifices of the elderly children of the Waiwupu, the foreigner excuses and consoles himself by attributing to them occult faculties and resources of a very high order.

To a similar Western bewilderment is due, it seems to me, the extraordinary overestimate of the statesmanship of the Empress Dowager. Forgetting the childishness of the Chinese, we attribute the Empress Dowager's usurpation and long tenure of power to such statesmanship as would have been needed to win and keep a Western throne. But of such statesmanship she had not even a conception. Only a child, and a spoiled child at that, would, after her experience of the Anglo-French capture of her capital and burning of her Summer Palace in 1860, have provoked in 1900 all Europe and Japan to a second invasion by her incitement of the Boxers to the attack on the Legations and to the extermination of the foreigner. Only a child, and a spoiled child, would, when on the brink of a war with Japan, have diverted to the rebuilding of the Summer Palace the sums designed for the creation of a navy. In fact, all the disasters of her disastrous reign were due to her utter lack of Elizabethan statesmanship. It is hard even to reconcile the character for shrewdness with which she is universally credited with her belief in the invulnerability of the Boxers while they were lying dead in heaps outside the Legation, or with her belief that her repetition of a Boxer incantation seventy times a day would cause the daily death of seventy "foreign devils." To be sure, the wish here was father to the thought, as it was in the hearts of the Boxers themselves, in all sympathisers with their movement, and in all China. Messrs. Bland and Backhouse, the two greatest of European experts on China, leave you in no doubt at all that China is of one heart and one mind, and will ever be of one heart and mind, in its deadly detestation of the "foreign devil." Every official, Chinese and Manchu alike, they assure you, hates the foreigner and all his works, and his hatred is representative of the universal sentiment towards us in China. The few "who pose as the friends of foreigners merely advocate dissimulation as a matter of expediency." How perfect and effective such dissimulation can be may be read in the "Penitential Decree" by which the Empress Dowager persuaded the Powers that she had issued "reiterated decrees for the extermination of the Boxers and the protection of the Christians," in the face of the fact known to all China that her ukases had all been for the encouragement of the Boxers and the extermination of the Christians. You have only to read the "Diary of his Excellency Ching Shan" in this volume—certainly the most interesting and instructive native document which has ever seen the light in Europe re the Boxer movement, the Empress's attitude towards it, and the attitude of all China towards us—to realise that simulation and dissimulation are as universal in China as the everyday conventional courtesies of bowing or handshaking are in Europe.

If you would understand the chief reasons for Chinese detestation of us you can read them in another interesting book on "The Great Empress Dowager of China" (²). In this Mr. Philip Sergeant says:—

China is not the only country where a breach of the conventions is a breach of morals—or worse. But in China some conventions have a peculiar force which they, perhaps, have nowhere else. And the foreign missionary comes to China sworn to defy these conventions and to teach his flock to defy them. He is seen forbidding homage to ancestors, making light of the sages, denying the popular gods, offending against the rules of the Feng-shui, setting his clients above the law, terrorising the magistrates, and encouraging in women an undue freedom of life. If he is touched, or if his mission buildings are damaged by scandalised villagers, or even by an irresponsible mob, then armed force steps in to avenge him, and at the best an indemnity is demanded; at the worst, heads may fall, officials may be cashiered, and fresh towns may be declared open ports for foreigners to reside in.

When one considers that the Chinese are the most convention-ridden people in the world, and that their conventions are absolutely sacred to them, it may well be imagined how the violation of them, and the violation with them of native laws as well as customs, are a source of perpetual irritation and agitation. The missionaries, as the moderate memorandum of the Chinese Government urged, are "founding an indefinite number of states within the State." England is far indeed from being as conventional or as bigoted as China; but if the Roman Catholic Church claimed for its converts in England all the privileges and exemptions she claims for them in China we might, perhaps, come to sympathise with the exasperation of the Chinese with this arrogant imperium in imperio.

A great doctor said once to my father: "The worst of it is that by the time we have earned our crust we have lost our teeth;" but a far greater surgeon—Sir Frederick Treves—has had the wisdom to retire with the crust he has well earned while his teeth are still serviceable. Here is another delightful record of a holiday of his—"Uganda" (³)—written with all the zest of youth and with all the skill and wisdom of age. Our associations with Uganda are all of sport, and chiefly of lion-hunting; but the lion is far from being the most formidable man-killer in Uganda. This honour belongs to the earliest form of animal life, the Trypanosoma gambiense, which, in alliance with a fly, has killed in five years 20,000 people! Sir Frederick's chapter upon the horrible sleeping sickness disease propagated by this fly interested me more than anything else in the volume, which, nevertheless, is packed from cover to cover with interesting if not exciting experiences.

A supper of pork chops and the reading, before you go to bed, of Mrs. Shelley's "Frankenstein" and of Stevenson's "Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" might possibly produce a nightmare comparable to Mr. Trevena's "Bracken" (⁴). I cannot, for my own part, believe in Mr. Trevena's occultism, nor in his palimpsest of a woman with two mutually discordant identities overlaying her original character.

Mr. Ayscough's heroine in "Mezzogiorno" (⁵) was much more interesting before she became a convert to Rome; while even our early and deep interest in her is arrested and dissipated by irrelevant and interminable digressions. It is quite a relief when, after her third marriage, the Græculus esuriens of Juvenal turns up to make things lively once more. In a word, what in old days would be the second volume of the novel might have been eliminated with advantage to its interest.

DESMOND O'BRIEN.

In an introduction to "Letters and Sketches from Northern Nigeria" (Chatto and Windus, price 6s.) Sir Percy Girouard pays a tribute to the memory of the author, the late Martin S. Kisch, a promising young Assistant Commissioner, who fell a victim to disease a few months after his arrival in the country. Those in authority regarded him as a recruit to the service who, if he had been spared, would have had a brilliant career. The book—a copy of which has been accepted by the King—consists of Mr. Kisch's racy letters to his family describing his work and experiences, and it is illustrated by numerous sketches and caricatures.

Japan has lately been the subject of many books, but the work by Mr. Joseph D'Autremer, which Mr. Fisher Unwin is publishing, is in some respects unique. Entitled "The Japanese Empire and its Economic Conditions," it deals in a concise and tabulated way with the industrial development of the country, the results being brought down to the end of last year. In addition to statistical and trade reports, it gives a survey of the geographical and geological formation of the country, an examination of the system of land concessions, and an account of the rise of the towns, and the condition of the people.

My apologies and my printer's are due to Major Gambier Parry and Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. for a double error in a paragraph in this column last week. Major Gambier Parry's name and the title of his new book "The Pageant of My Day" were both misprinted. It is a volume of essays dealing with thoughts and feelings with which many are familiar; but through the chapters, held together by threads more or less slender, "runs so much of the story of a life as seems worth faint indication and serves purpose."

Mr. Algernon Cecil, whose volume of essays, "Six Oxford Thinkers," won success a year ago, is publishing a new book entitled "Essays in Imitation" (of Carlyle, Swift, and Lamb) through Mr. Murray. In fiction Mr. Murray is issuing this month two books by ladies. One by Miss R. Macaulay, "The Valley of Captives," contains a study of a nervous character harassed and troubled by uncongenial circumstances and disaster. The other is a novel by Miss Maude Goldring, entitled "The Downsman," the scene of which is placed on the Sussex Downs.

Among the new novels in Messrs. Greening's list for immediate publication are "The Girl's Head," by Mr. Edgar Jepson; "The Revolt at Roskelly's," by Mr. William Caine; and "The King's Masquerade," by Miss May Wynne. The novels just issued by the same firm include "Bohemian Blood," by Lester Lurgan; "Love and the Forge," a story of Hampshire life and character, by Frank Dilnot; and "A Dreamer's Tragedy," a first book by Owen Stranger.

Mr. W. D. Howells's new volume, "Imaginary Interviews," consists for the most part of genial criticisms of contemporary phases of life and literature. It is being published by Messrs. Harper.

Portraits in colour of "The Four Georges," together with a dozen illustrations in black and white, are the special feature of an attractive reprint of Thackeray's lectures, published (price 5s. net) by Messrs. Black. The volume has an introduction by Mr. Gordon Home.

ART.

ON hearing a young woman express heartfelt admiration of Mr. Albert Goodwin the other day at Messrs. Leggatt's exhibition of his works, I was tempted to reflect on the adjectival barrenness of your true-born Briton The young woman in question stood before the water-colours of Venice, Niagara, Cairo, Winchelsea, emitting with the rapidity of a machine-gun: "Oh, jolly! I say, isn't this jolly? Oh, do look! I thought that one was jolly, but this is even jollier! I wish I could buy that jolly one! Oh, isn't it just too——!" Luckily I remembered the entente cordiale between jolly and "joli," and came to the conclusion that the young woman was less far out than her attitude might have led one to suppose. For Mr. Goodwin's water-colours are, among other things, essentially pretty, and it is not the least of his qualities that this sheer prettiness has in no way led to the sacrifice of the sterling features of his work.

It is characteristic of Mr. Goodwin that he is one of the very few painters who have not been overwhelmed by the tourist beauties of Switzerland, but that, laying aside the point of view of American "glaishers," and mountains at a guinea a day, is able to use the Eiger, Pilatus, or Lucerne as a vehicle, and a particularly useful vehicle, for his own luminous delicacy and charm. In spite, however, of his rainbow-coloured Altdorf, in spite of a beautiful Turner-cum-Goodwin "Venice," it is in his English work, "Whitby, Winchester," and in particular Winchelsea and Rye, that he surpasses himself, if only by the ease with which he represents them.

Mr. Goodwin, I believe, inclines rather to his allegorical paintings than to the landscapes by which he will eventually be remembered. Actually not even his English love of mysticism carries him over the difficulties—almost the impossibilities—of "The First Christmas Dawn" and the "Passage of the Red Sea." Nor is "The Towers of Silence"—the halfway house between the allegorical and the landscape proper—with its gruesomely suggestive vultures, nearly as successful as is his less ambitious and more single-minded work.

Whether, however, the visitor prefers one or the other, or whether he prefers them all as "jolly," he cannot but realise that in delicacy of feeling, in sheer love of nature, and in technical skill, Mr. Goodwin is the worthy and direct descendant of all that is best among the English water-colourists.

A number of exhibitors at the Fine Art Gallery produce a somewhat confused effect of the one-man and the every-man show together. Mr. T. C. Derrick has a charming illustration, "The River," while Mr. Edwin Noble has some effective picture-book illustrations of dogs. Of these, "The Bob-tailed Sheep-dog" is, perhaps, the most successful. Mr. Duncan Carse owes much both to Mr. Rackham and to Aubrey Beardsley. There is no harm in a debt, provided the debtor be solvent. On the whole, however, Mr. Carse's "Exotics," a charming little study, is the only one which he has really paid for with originality. I seem to remember Mr. Paul Woodroffe's illustrations to the "Tempest." Hard and conventional, they completely fail to reach the high standard of present-day illustration. Miss Olive Snell's portraits show considerable facility and much sprightliness. Also she has caught with great skill the spirit of the pretty fashionable woman of to-day. "Mrs. Oscar Lewisham" and "Madame la Baronne" are vastly superior to the portrait, say, of "Lord Courtney," which has not even the merit of being a likeness. If I were pretty, rich, well dressed, and fond of admiration I should ask Miss Snell to do my portrait.

At the same gallery Mr. William Wood is exhibiting pictures of evening, night, and dawn. These are a little cold in tone even from the point of view of night. "The Leaves of Life" and "Still on the Bough" express much more fully what Mr. Wood means to express in all his pictures—a sort of fatalistic quietude. His trees show his best work, and in a very simple convention he contrives to convey the real spirit of the woods.

It were hardly surprising nowadays if the readers of books were in inverse proportion to the buyers. For the cheap reprint has caused every one to buy for his friends and not for himself, while the illustrated book saves both parties from the necessity of reading at all. Mr. Heinemann's two latest publications, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" (15s. net), which, I gather from Mr. Hugh Thomson's humorously pretty illustrations, is written by one William Shakespeare, and "The Romance of Tristram and Iseult" (15s. net), excellently translated from the French by Miss Florence Simmonds and illustrated by Mr. Maurice Lalau, show more or less broadly the two main lines of present-day illustration. While maintaining all his original charm, Mr. Thomson has allowed himself to be influenced both by Mr. Rackham and Mr. Hassall. The result is the graceful mischief of the "Merry Wives," of which Master Slender, Anne Page, and Mistress Quickly have most of all caught the real spirit of comedy. M. Lalau deals in the blues and purples of the night; his dragon is a really terrific beast, with no suggestion of a stuffed Faffner; his battle scene a triumph of "blugginess." On the whole, his pictures are very regal, though now and again he is inclined to substitute modern decadence for the romance which belongs properly to all great love stories.

It was inevitable that Miss Florence Harrison's illustrations of Christina Rossetti's poem (Blackie, 15s. net) should partake of Prae-Raphaelitism generally. On the whole, however, it is Prae-Raphaelitism up to date, and no milk-and-water imitation. Also the limitations within which Christina Rossetti did her work have been strictly observed by the illustrator. In the expressionless maidens of the "Maiden Song," in the charming Miss-Siddall suggestion of a "Peal of Bells," and in the spirituality of the "Martyr Son," Miss Harrison has attempted and achieved an exact echo rather than a revelation of the poetess.

No one can accuse Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton of adventuring themselves all too boldly upon virgin soil. Pickwick, Hamlet, Dr. Jorrocks, and Longfellow are, I suppose, four of the oldest and most familiar friends of this country. Of the four publications, Mr. Armour's illustrations of Jorrocks (10s. 6d. net), take the lead, with their excellent and essentially English characterisation. Mr. Frank Reynolds' "Pickwick" (15s. net), follows a good second, and it says much for him that he has succeeded in being no more original than Dickens himself, and very nearly as humorous. Mr. Simmond's "Hamlet" (10s. 6d. net), with the exception of the frontispiece, is over-dire and dark and dreadful; he leaves too little to the imagination, and is one more proof that if Shakespearean tragedy is better read than staged, it is also less stagey on the boards than between them. There is a quaint mediævalism about the majority of Mr. Sidney Meteyard's illustrations of "Golden Legend" (10s. 6d. net), which is essentially in keeping with the poem. "Hail, Virgin Mary," the frontispiece, is of the Lippo Lippi genus, and it is fortunate that the illustrator has on the whole kept rather to this convention than to the Böcklin-like decadence of "A Jester's Cap and Bells."

MUSIC.

THE appointment of Mr. Landon Ronald to succeed Dr. Cummings at the Guildhall School is an event of note. There is every reason to anticipate that he will fill the position with credit and distinction. He is young, he is energetic, he has had experience of musical life in all its phases, he is highly gifted himself as a practical musician in many branches of the art, he is a good man of business and an excellent speaker—in short, his qualifications are numerous and obvious, and if some regard a man not yet forty as fully young for such a post it may be replied that this is a disqualification which time will speedily remove. Mr. Ronald will have plenty of scope for his reforming zeal at the Guildhall School, and friends of that institution will look to see many changes in its methods and administration as the result of his appointment. It is pleasant to know at the same time that he does not propose to abandon his ambitions as a conductor—for we have not too many native conductors to be able to afford to lose one of the most gifted.

If there were an operatic trade union objection might conceivably be raised against Fraulein Petzl-Perard on the score that she was not playing the game fairly in doubling the rôles of Venus and Elizabeth on Saturday last at Covent Garden; as it was, however, the feat proved quite an interesting tour de force, entitling her to hearty congratulation. Otherwise the performance had no features of special note—unless it was the fact that the Landgrave, unlike the remainder of the company, sang in English, the explanation being that he was an eleventh hour substitute, Mr. Reynolds by name, who under the circumstances did exceedingly well. Earlier in the week a performance of "Le Nozze" was given which, while it had its good points, would obviously have been all the better for further rehearsal; while on another evening Miss Maggie Teyte made a charming Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust."

Many attractive concerts have been given lately. Mr. Newman's annual benefit concert on Wednesday was rendered specially noteworthy by a superb performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto by Herr Fritz Kreisler; I think I have never heard this great artist play more finely. On Saturday Herr Backhaus was the soloist at the second of the Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts, and played very brilliantly as usual in Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F minor, Dr. Walford Davies's fine Festal Overture being another enjoyable feature of the programme. Two attractive chamber concerts were those of the Flonzaley Quartet, whose playing is as wonderful as ever, and of the Classical Concert Society, at which Mr. Leonard Borwick played some Debussy in his most attractive style; while a sound performance of "Elijah" at the Albert Hall gave the Royal Choral Society's fortieth season a good send off—Mr. Edmund Burke, the well-known operatic artist, who now made his first appearance in oratorio in London, doing excellently as the Prophet.

Mr. Beecham has got himself into hot water again by his cutting propensities. When he conducted the prelude to Mr. Holbrooke's "Dylan" at the Queen's Hall the other day he omitted about eight or ten pages of the score, and the Musical Standard berates him soundly in consequence. It is not quite clear what part, if any, the composer played in the matter, since the writer in the Musical Standard merely says, "We gather he is very far from sanctioning the omissions." It is hardly to be supposed, however, that Mr. Beecham made the cuts in question without informing the composer, even though he may have adopted this course in the case of the Elgar symphony (in A flat, by the way, not E flat, as the Musical Standard has it) when he took that work on tour—but the circumstances were somewhat different in that case.

The forthcoming performance of extensive selections from "Parsifal" by the Queen's Hall Choral Society will be an event of interest. Generous excerpts from all three acts are to be given, and stress is laid on the fact that the selections are to be presented on this occasion in their proper sequence. While it will be pleasant to hear the music of "Parsifal" again, it is idle ever to expect concert performances of this sort to give anything like the proper effect of the music. In my experience they are invariably unsatisfactory and disappointing. The purely instrumental parts of Wagner, such as the overtures, are usually heard to even better advantage in the concert room than in the opera house, but not so the rest. For one thing, the singers standing at the front of the platform with a powerful orchestra immediately behind them are always more or less overwhelmed, the conditions being utterly different from those obtaining when they are on the stage and the orchestra is beneath them. But in the case of "Parsifal" there is, of course, exceptional justification for its performance in this manner in the fact that it can never be given in any other way.

No less eminent a person than the Lord Mayor was guilty of a very common misquotation when, in addressing the pupils of the Guildhall School of Music last week, he quoted Shakespeare as having said:—

> In sweet music is such art,
> Killing care and grief of heart.

What Shakespeare really said was—

> In sweet music is such art,
> Killing care and grief of heart
> Fall asleep or hearing, die.

Sullivan, it may be remembered, made precisely the same mistake in his well-known setting of the lines as a song.

The reappearance in London of Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch is an event of some interest. A few years ago no figure was more familiar than his in musical circles in London, and amateurs of the "precious" order went into ecstasies over his attempts to revive interest in those obsolete instruments the harpsichord and the clavichord. Mr. Bernard Shaw, among other adherents of the cult, went so far, I remember, as to inform the public that the harpsichord was not merely interesting as a survival, but vastly superior in every respect to the pianoforte, which he condemned as a hideous contraption which was absolutely intolerable to any sensitive and artistic hearer. The mere fact that all the most eminent musicians who have lived since the pianoforte was invented have differed totally from him on this point did not trouble Mr. Shaw in the least. He luxuriated, more suo, in the position of being himself the only man in step. But whether he is of the same opinion still it would be interesting to know. If so, the pianoforte presumably holds no place among his household gods, and the harpsichord tinkles in its stead.

Anyhow, this particular form of affectation seems generally to have died a more or less natural death, partly, no doubt, for lack of harpsichord players, though it is tolerably obvious that if people really derived such pleasure from these feeble old instruments as they profess to, this fact would not prevent their getting them and playing on them. Now that Mr. Dolmetsch has appeared on the scene once more I suppose that we may look for a recrudescence of the fad. It is stated, by the way, that during his recent residence in America Mr. Dolmetsch has succeeded, as the results of numerous experiments, in effecting many improvements in the tone and mechanism of the antique instruments in question, and it may at least be agreed that there was ample room for this. Another well-known musician who, it is said, has recently been giving attention to the harpsichord is Busoni, and it is stated that it is not improbable that he will be heard on it in public before long.

THE THEATRES.

Re-opening of the Adelphi.

THERE is something about everything that Mr. George Edwardes does that betrays the master hand of a great general. Material which in other hands would only spell disaster when moulded by him emerges triumphantly. He knows what he wants and he knows what the public likes, and so again and again he leads his little army of composers, librettists, costumiers, scene painters, and lyric writers triumphantly to victory. This time in producing "The Quaker Girl" he has not only moulded the play, but he has re-moulded a theatre to suit it. He has worked wonders with the chilly old Adelphi. The entrances are reconstructed, and made convenient and handsome; the vestibule with its dark oak panelling is charming, while the seating has all been re-arranged on the lines of the Gaiety. The improvement is so great that I could hardly believe I was in the same house as the one where Sir Arthur Conan Doyle only a few weeks since was running his melodramas. As to the play itself, well, as a play it is one of the poorest that Mr. Edwardes has produced for a long while. The story of the little Quaker girl who leaves a country village to become a mannequin in Madame Blum's famous dressmaking establishment in Paris is exceedingly thin, nor do we care much for the other love story of the exiled Bonapartist Princess and her English Captain. I can fancy Mr. Edwardes realising the tenuity of the libretto and determining to so swamp it with lavish detail that everyone should be satisfied. Accordingly he engaged a magnificent cast. Miss Gertie Millar has come from the Gaiety to take up the part of the demure little Quakeress Prudence Pym. Mr. Joseph Coyne has left Daly's to play the irresponsible Naval Attaché at the American Embassy who falls in love with her. Mr. Hayden Coffin is the King's Messenger who woos the exiled Princess. Miss Elsie Spain has come from "The Chocolate Soldier" to play that same Princess, and clever little Miss Gracie Leigh is her maid. Here is a galaxy of stars for you, and as one and all have effective parts, the whole thing goes merrily enough. I have not, by the way, mentioned Mr. James Blakeley. He is delightfully humorous as a Quaker lad who is only Quakerish on his mother's side; and capital, too, is a new-comer—namely, Mlle. Caumont. Her vivacity is infectious and her halting English most fascinating. She is, indeed, a great acquisition. Throughout all the first part of the play Mr. Joseph Coyne has one of the best parts he has ever had, and he acts it better than he has ever done anything before. Pity it is that in the end of the play his part shows a tendency to dwindle away, but, mirabile dictu, he is acquiring a diminutive voice, and now sings instead of speaking all his songs! Miss Millar, of course, is Miss Millar, dainty, roguish, and charming; while I was only sorry that Miss Leigh had not more to do. She is a brilliant little comédienne, and I would willingly have heard her sing more than one song, particularly as that one was very reminiscent of one of her former successes. I am afraid that being reminiscent is the glaring fault of the whole production, though I would leave out Mr. Lionel Monckton's very melodious score in this sweeping indictment. Where Mr. Monckton is reminiscent he so skilfully and tunefully disguises the fact that you forgive him at once, and he has supplied the piece with so successful a waltz—and without a compelling waltz no musical play is of any use nowadays—that, even after the first night, every one was humming it, and I am sure it will spread over London like a wave, and attain, maybe, to barrel-organ fame.

There is still one other matter which should be touched upon. I believe that many people who go to see "George Edwardes" musical comedy go to see youth and beauty, and youth and beauty swoop on to the stage in battalions. I doubt if any play has shown a braver array of damsels more beautifully gowned. What is curious, however, is to note the new style of dancing which modern dress has evolved. A line from an old song comes into my head:—

It's a queer sort of up-and-down motion, and this line exactly describes dancing in a modern sheath skirt. You cannot do much except jump up and down. The "tempestuous" petticoat was a far greater help to picturesque effects. However, "The Quaker Girl," I am pretty confident, has come to stay, but the honours are with Mr. Edwardes. No one else can put on these shows quite as he can, and no one, I suppose, reaps quite the same reward.

"Behind the Veil," at the Coronet.

I can only imagine that Mr. Cecil Raleigh sat down to write "Behind the Veil" with the idea of showing people that turning out excellent melodramas of the type of "The Whip" is not the kind of work that really satisfies his artistic ambitions. Strange it is that people who do one thing well always want to do something else which they do badly. Artists want to write, writers want to paint, novelists fancy themselves as poets, and poets think that they are dramatists. It is the same all the way round, and now here is Mr. Raleigh astonishing us with a weird and amazing "psychic drama" all about a prodigal infidel young prince with a strange wild mind and a soul that believes in nothing, and showing us his regeneration at the hands of the mother superior of a convent and a beautiful young cousin. "Behind the Veil" is a play which deals with the highest flights of imagination. If you can conceive Marie Corelli rewriting "Faust" for the Family Herald you may gain some inkling of its nature. Prince Maurice Le Noir, for thus he is happily named, "seeks in the nightmares of science the light of truth," and as a result he goes nearly crazy. Then by means of a Maskelyne and Cooke device played upon him by the beautiful young cousin he is led to believe that he has rejuvenated the elderly abbess, and that this radiant young thing has come into being through his black arts. It is a most immoral fraud that the girl works on him, although it is done for the best of motives, and I am not surprised that she is afraid he will go out of his mind when he discovers the truth, though as a matter of fact the Prince seems so utterly demented throughout the play that nothing could well make him more fit for a madhouse. Of course, in the end good prevails; and the young couple come together, but I felt profoundly sorry for Miss Viva Birkett, who played the heroine with great charm, in that she was giving herself to so crazy a lover. One of the great scenes in the play shows the Prince giving a party at the Le Noir Mansion, in Paris, to a crowd of smart demi-mondaines. Here you have one of those typical Bohemian orgies such as you often see on the stage, and my interest woke up considerably when a vivacious young thing announced that she would do a dance down the supper table without upsetting a single glass, but, alas! she was prevented from showing us this feat by the entrance of the heroine. Thenceforward I lost interest in the Titanic struggle between the powers of good and evil, though I thought that the Prince might have had better manners, even though he felt himself at the dawn of a moral upheaval, than to suddenly insult all his guests and hound them out of his mansion. After all, demi-mondaines have feelings, and to invite them to a luxurious supper and then kick them out just when they are at the height of their enjoyment seemed to me very unprincely and discourteous. The play has its humorous moments and its dramatic moments, but its tedious moments outweigh them both, and I have seldom sat through such an amazing farrago of spiritualism, mysticism, and melodrama, while when Prince Le Noir explained in terribly lengthy speeches the curious and chaotic condition of his mind I wanted to run away. Perhaps Mr. Raleigh has been reading J. K. Huysmans. In any case I hope he will return to giving us saner fare, because a very little of "Behind the Veil" goes a very long way.

* * * * * *

"The Arcadians" celebrated its 550th performance at the Shaftesbury Theatre on Thursday evening, and its popularity is undiminished. This is quite as it should be, for no more tasteful and charming musical play has been seen in London for many years. The cast remains the same, but the dresses are all new, and I wish my pen were equal to describing the ravishing costumes, which, I understand, are intended to forecast 1911 fashions. It would take many columns and the knowledge of an expert to explain their beauty. Miss Florence Smithson sings as charmingly as ever, and Mr. Dan Rolyat and Mr. Alfred Lester never let the fun flag.

* * * * * *

"Company for George," Mr. Warren Bell's clever farce which is going merrily at the Kingsway, is now preceded by a one-act play called "The Outcome of Agitation," written by Mr. James Douglas. It is a very naïve little production, in which a man who has listened to an agitator and joined in a strike, and as a consequence has lost his job, is, with his family, saved from starvation by a prosperous brother who returns from Canada just in the nick of time. He pays off a humorous bailiff, carries every one off to Canada with him, and, in short, plays the good fairy all round. I only hoped that Canada would prove the promised land that he painted it. As an aid to emigration the little play should be a great success.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

A WRITER in a daily paper suggests that the Newmarket Craven Meeting should be given up, and that there shall be three Summer Meetings. The proposal is ridiculous. There is always some very interesting sport at the Craven Meeting, at which the first three-year-old races of any importance take place. There is no room during the summer for a third meeting at Newmarket, as the list of fixtures at that period of the season is already mischievously overcrowded. The best change which could be made at Newmarket would be to transfer the Second Spring Meeting to the July Course.

I read in a non-sporting paper that the Middle Park Plate was a remarkable race this year, because for the first time there was an objection to the winner, and that winner was a gelding, which is unexampled. Democrat, who won the Middle Park Plate in 1899, was also a gelding, and he, like Borrow, was bred in the United States. There was an objection in 1874, when Plebeian won, and it would probably have been successful but for the opinion of the late Lord Falmouth, which, of course, carried great weight. The betting in that year was tremendously heavy, as books on the race were opened at Doncaster, and there has never since been such extensive speculation on the Middle Park Plate. When the horses went to the post Lord Dupplin had a bet of 16,000 to 1,000 about Per Se, who finished second; and the joint owners of Plebeian stood to win very large sums over their colt. Galopin would have won in a canter if he had been judiciously ridden.

I see that it is regretted that Seaforth is not engaged in the Derby. Pietri and St. Nat are mentioned as the best colts in that race. St. Nat was struck out of the Derby when the minor forfeit was declared on March 29, which is as unfortunate a blunder as the withdrawal of Baron Maurice Rothschild's Faucheur, winner of the Grand Criterion, who is one of the best two-year-olds in France. St. Nat is entered for the Grand Prix de Paris, and this is the only great race in which he is engaged. He is left in for the Greenham Stakes of £1,000 at the Newbury Spring Meeting, and his only other important engagements are the Whitsuntide Plate of £1,000 at Hurst Park in May, and the Atlantic Stakes at Liverpool in July, in which latter race St. Nat has the advantage of a breeding allowance of 8 lbs. There is a very fine entry for this race, including Swynford, Stedfast, Hair Trigger II., Bronzino, and Louvigny. If St. Nat is considered to be a flier six months hence, he will, no doubt, run for the Coronation Cup at Epsom.

Nuage, winner of the Grand Prix de Paris, cannot be trained again, and he has been sold to the German Government for 300,000 francs, and he goes to the Graditz stud. The early retirement of Nuage from the Turf is much to be regretted, as one would have liked to see him running for next year's Ascot Cup. He was highly tried early in the summer, and he had fine speed, combined with genuine stamina. He would have won the St. Leger if he had been engaged in that race, and if he had come to the post at Doncaster in the form which he discovered at Longchamps when he easily defeated several of the best French three-year-olds, as well as Lemberg, Bronzino, and Charles O'Malley. The doodles who were gulled into believing that the Grand Prix was a good thing for Lemberg were very nicely taken in, as the success of Nuage was confidently expected by a large number of clever people in France. When the French have a good thing the national talent for "les affaires" displays itself by discreet silence, and there was no preliminary cackling about the merits of Nuage. This horse is wonderfully inbred to Galopin, as he is by Simonian out of Nephte, by Flying Fox.

Mr. J. B. Joel has been unreasonably blamed because he did not start The Story for the Cambridgeshire, as it is maintained that he ought to have given the public a run for their money. If "the public" choose to back a horse long before the race is run, when there is no genuine market, the result being that the animal is rushed to short odds, they must not blame the owner if they do not get a run for their money. It would have been quite impossible for Mr. Joel to back The Story at anything like a fair price, and especially after Verney had won the Cesarewitch, as his horse had been coupled with Mr. Neumann's in many double event bets. The Story is evidently very smart, and those who fancied him for the Cambridgeshire had reason, for he was apparently well in with 7 st. 12 lbs., but he would not have beaten Christmas Daisy at 4 lbs. The rush on Mustapha for the Durham Handicap was a piece of wonderful good luck for the backers of The Story, as it made a fine market for their horse.

I see it is asserted that Thalia would have won the Cambridgeshire if she had got off. I fancied Thalia very much after her excellent public trial at the First October Meeting, but I do not believe she would have beaten Christmas Daisy under any circumstances. The mare could not go the pace, for there has seldom been a faster run race, and Christmas Daisy had won a long way from home. If Thalia had got off on fair terms, and if The represents the highest order of construction, possesses several unique and indispensable devices, and enjoys the testimony and support of all the leading musicians. It is even of greater importance for you to realise that through the PIANOLA PIANO you can gain an intimate practical knowledge of all the music that the genius of eminent composers has given to the world. Listening to music can never be the same thing as playing it for yourself. As a listener you would never even have the opportunity of hearing a tithe of the music you can personally produce on the Pianola Piano. With such a prospect before you is it not almost imperatively worth your while to learn more about this remarkable instrument?

The Pianola Piano (Steinway, Weber, or Steck Piano) must not be confounded with other instruments purporting to yield like artistic results. If you do not see the name Pianola on the instrument it is not a Pianola Piano.

Story had started, it is highly probable that they would have finished second and third. Christmas Daisy has won the Cambridgeshire two years running, and in each race he obviously had a stone in hand, a result which is certainly not to the credit of the handicappers. It would be much better next year to postpone the publication of the weights until after the First October Meeting, for the early betting is now all vapour, and it is a fatuous absurdity to go on bringing them out two months before the race is run.

There are 320 entries for the St. Leger of 1912, as against 316 for next year's race. There were originally 323 entries for the St. Leger of 1911, but King Edward had seven nominations which are void. The list for 1912 is headed by his Majesty, who has engaged four of the Sandringham yearlings, one of them being a colt by Thrush out of Laodamia. The Duke of Portland has six entries, including colts by Marco out of Quair (daughter of Memoir) and by Velocity out of Mrs. Butterwick, and a filly by Gallinule out of La Roche. Mr. L. de Rothschild also has six entries, five of his lot being sired by St. Frusquin. The Duke of Westminster's lot of five includes a colt by Lord Bobs out of Throstle. Mr. S. Joel has five entries, four of his lot being sired by Polymelus. Lord Rosebery's five include a half-sister to Neil Gow, by William the Third, and a colt by Velocity out of Gas. Mr. W. Astor has engaged a half-brother, by Isinglass, to Mirador, and Sir W. Bass has a filly by Carbine out of Sceptre. Mr. "Fairie's" lot of three includes Silesia, half-sister, by Spearmint, to Bayardo and Lemberg, and one of Mr. Neumann's is a half-sister, by Spearmint, to Cellini, Electra, and Siberia. There are a large number of American entries, but the only French owners who have engaged yearlings are M. Edmond Blanc (two), M. Vanneck (two), and M. Michael Ephrussi, who has three entries. Prince Ladislas Luboomirski, who was represented in this year's race by Ksiaze Pan intends to try again at Doncaster, for he has engaged Lom, half-brother to the Baden winner, by Gouvernant. Until the last few years the St. Leger was merely a sweepstakes of £25 each. It is now a race of £6,500, the sweepstakes being the same as in the Derby and Oaks. £500 is taken for the nominator of the winner, this being, of course, a bait to attract the public breeders. Last year £1,755 was drawn from the fund in order to make up the advertised value of the race, but this season the deficit was only £835. The "classic" stakes ought not to close until after the yearling sales of the season are over. If this change were made there would be an end to the unfair deduction of £500 from Derby and St. Leger (£400 from Oaks) for the breeder of the winner. If the Derby had closed last year in September instead of in July it is quite certain that Seaforth would have been entered by his owner, but the colt's breeder did not think it worth while to engage him at Epsom.

Halcyon and Telbedde were very heavily backed for the Newbury Handicap, the pair starting equal favourites at 2 to 1, but they were beaten by Tor-bay, who had not won a race for more than sixteen months. Phaleron ran well enough, but on his best form he would have won easily. It was a mistake to attach any importance to Halcyon's place in the Cambridgeshire, as many horses were not ridden out in that race.

There are very poor acceptances for most of the handicaps at Liverpool. Only four horses had been left in for the Lancashire Handicap of £400, and there are only thirteen acceptances for the Knowsley Nursery of £1,000. The failure of this two-year-old handicap is astonishing, and it was very odd to find only thirty-four entries for this race of £1,000, and twenty-six for the Liverpool Nursery of £500, when there were thirty-one for the Anchor Nursery of £200 and the same number for the Downe Nursery of £150; while, at Lincoln, there were forty-eight entries for the Chaplin Nursery of £500 and thirty-four for the Blankney Nursery of £200. The principal T.Y.C. handicaps have also done badly, there being only thirty-two entries for the Stewards' Plate and twenty-six for the Croxteth Plate, each race being worth £350.

The Liverpool Cup is now a post-betting race, and there is no genuine market until the numbers are up. There is not likely to be a large field, and Succour or Sunspot may win.

Next week has meetings at Leicester, Derby, and Lewes. The best sport will be at Derby, but the entries for some of the principal events are not so large as usual. There are twenty-three acceptances for the Chesterfield Nursery of £1,000 on Wednesday. I fancy Seashell or Bahati.

F.A. AND A.F.A.—UNIVERSITY FOURS—BILLIARDS.

In the Isle of Thanet, which is in Kent, there have forgathered members of the Football Association and of the Amateur Football Association. They passed a resolution that the time had come for the breach between these two bodies to be healed, and Mr. Norman Craig, K.C., who is the member for that division of the county, has taken upon himself the burden of attempting to bring the parties together. Well, it is said that fools rush in where angels fear to tread. But Mr. Norman Craig is no fool, and he may well have considered that after the Constitutional Conference no man need despair about adjusting any dispute. He will have a difficult job before him, and yet his path has been made more easy by the success that has attended the A.F.A. It has received the patronage of the King. It has a seat on the Olympic Council. It can provide good-class football. Its teams, or rather the clubs that belong to it, are strong enough to defeat the Universities. It has secured the best class of amateurs. It is by no means a class organisation. It has ridden itself of the incubus of officialdom that directly or indirectly makes money out of the game. It has worthily maintained its ideal of playing the game for its own sake, and it has created an atmosphere altogether purer than that which pervades a very large section of Rugby football. In no sense has it hindered the progress of the game. It has done all this in the face of press hostility and opposition of the most unscrupulous character which has been directed at times from the headquarters of the F.A. In the press a kinder tone now prevails. Hopes of reconciliation are expressed. At a recent gathering of the Middlesex F.A., which is affiliated to the F.A., a leading speaker advocated peace. Now in Kent both sides meet in conference.

The F.A cannot be blind to these facts. It cannot remain deaf to these appeals. The party that makes the first overtures will win the day. The F.A. authorities must recognise that the boycott has failed. Perhaps they think that these appeals show that the A.F.A. is weakening. They must recognise that the conciliation movement is spreading within their own ranks. But the inner ring shows itself as obdurate as ever. Mr. Hewitt, the hon. secretary for the Sheriff's Charity Shield, recently wrote a courteous letter hoping that it might be possible once again to renew the charity match between the Corinthians and a crack professional club. The matter was not even laid before the Council. Mr. F. J. Wall, the secretary, sent the coldest and curtest of replies. I wonder if he will treat Mr. Norman Craig in the same way. The walls of Jericho fell at last, and the walls of the F.A. may suffer a similar fate. Well-informed writers in the sporting press intimate that questions of policy do not affect the situation one way or the other. The vital question is personal and not political. Certain of the great ones of the F.A. world are standing on their dignity, which is to them of more importance than the interests of the game. They have all the petty obstinacy of King George III. They are annoyed at the success of the A.F.A. They are affronted because those whom they essayed to trample on stood up to them and defied them. In the heat of strife hot words were spoken and written on both sides. But these football potentates cannot forgive or forget. They have such a high conception of their own immaculate omnipotence that they blind themselves to facts and utilise their power for their own personal ends rather than for the game they are supposed to serve. The peacemakers in the F.A. will therefore have to get peacemakers on the Council of the F.A. It may be that wiser, kinder, and happier counsels will prevail amongst the inner ring. There is ample room in this realm of England for both associations to work. There is more than enough for both to do. It should not be impossible for each to continue to act with a latitude of independence determined only by a joint allegiance to a small central authority which would define the laws of the game, select international and representative teams, and arrange that the suspensions and punishments of teams belonging to either or both associations should be mutually recognised. If only personal pique could be forgotten for five minutes the gate for reconciliation would be opened. He who is powerful can afford to be generous. The F.A. is a powerful body. It has done and is doing excellent work. But it made a mistake. No one wants it to eat humble pie. All one hopes is that it will wipe out the effects of its mistake.

The supporters of Oxford were very cock-a-whoop over the Rugby team's success against the United Services, little realising how weakened the Services were both outside and in the scrum. The new three-quarter line, with Poulton inside, was arranged and settled. Cambridge was in the cart. But on the same day Cambridge had found something like form, and the forwards lasting well, had fairly beaten a very hot team—London Hospital. Then Oxford came up to town to play the Harlequins, and the Dark Blues were well beaten, even though Lambert, the Harlequin three-quarter, was off the field all the second half. Poulton is an individualist. His place is on the wing. Oxford need not go to the States for three-quarters. The Harlequins well deserved their win, but one does expect that a class club like the Harlequins will play halves who put the ball properly into the scrummage. Cambridge won at Richmond, and they won after a scrambling game. They have the makings of a team. But why arrange for both teams to come to town the same afternoon?

The older you get the quicker time flies. The old University man, if he throws back his mind and recalls his University days would be surprised to read in last Sunday's papers that the University Fours had been rowed. He can scarcely realise that term has begun. Only the other day his own boy was going up. He recalls that as a fresher by the time the Fours were rowed he was beginning to consider himself rather an expert on fixed seat oarsmanship, and was just understanding rowing shop, which he preferred to listen to—nay, perforce had to—in a very soft-cushioned chair. There was no very good racing at Oxford until the final. Trinity had caused a mild surprise by beating the House. Balliol had to scratch as their stroke had strained a muscle, and New College were easily beaten at the finish by Magdalen. There was a good head stream but with little wind when Trinity—averaging 10 st. 12½ lbs., and the heaviest man 11 st. 10 lbs.—met Magdalen (with Garton 13 st. 6 lbs. at stroke and each of the other men 12 st. 4 lbs.). It was a splendid race between the Dreadnought and the Destroyer, and the Dreadnought won by a bare three-quarters of a length, after a plucky spurt by Coleridge, the Trinity stroke. I said last year that he was an oar worth looking after. He has a good rhythm, which he no doubt gets from his poetic ascendant, and his length may be attributed to his grandfather's personality. But for Bourne he would probably have stroked the University. The racing was closer at Cambridge. Thank goodness the blithering rubbish that has been written about this, that, and the other style seems to have died a natural death. Fairbairn had not enough time to do Jesus all the good that he might have done. The Hall had the same four that won the Wyfolds and Visitors' at Henley. Young Swann was stroking and his father coached the crew. The Rev. S. Swann rowed for Cambridge in 1884-85. I forget whether he rowed in 1886 for the Hall, when it went head of the river, bumping Jesus, who had been head for eleven years. At all events, he rowed in the winning Grand for the Hall in 1886, and in the four that won the Stewards' in 1885 and 1887. McKenna, the First Lord of the Admiralty, rowed bow in the 1886 and 1887 crews. If I remember rightly Swann was a curate at Devonport, and the 1886 crew practised down at the Dockyard. At Cambridge he twice won the pairs, and he also won the Colquhouns. Old Blues will hope that his son may row for Cambridge. The help he has given the Hall should do good to Cambridge rowing. They had a splendid race with Pembroke, whom they just beat in fast time. Pembroke were quite a good crew, but Van Der Byl, who steered, looked round time after time and spoiled their chance. Then they had a desperate race with the holders, First Trinity, stroked by Rosher, who only just beat them. The final was a fine race between Third and First. After the Railway Bridge Third went up rapidly, and won by forty yards in very fast time. Third had a second four on, which were beaten in the semi-final by the first four. There is no getting away from the fact that when Third is strong Cambridge rowing is likely to be in the ascendant. Cambridge should be able to turn out a good eight this year. Their form in the fours was better than that shown at Oxford. Gibbons' coaching did Third a lot of good.

Young Gray, the Australian billiard player, has made a stir in the billiard world. He is bound by contract to play with certain balls and a certain table. This is good business for the traders interested, but it necessarily discounts his performances. It would have been interesting to see him challenge for the championship where ivory balls are used. However, it seems as though he will have a chance of a game. Inman is willing to play Gray on the contract table and with the contract balls if the manufacturers give him a fair remuneration for the advertisement that such a match will bring. They can scarcely refuse Inman's offer.

TO AN OLD FOX.

Old Fox you remember last sombre November
Ere dim-eyed December
Had frozen the slush,
Your red-skinned relations received invitations
To end our impatience,
And yield us a brush:

We bade our steeds follow with speed of the swallow
By thicket and hollow,
By thorn-brake and briar,
Your trophy, a beauty, we reckoned our duty
To bag first as booty,
You crafty old sire.

You dodged like a rabbit when reapers would grab it
Or farm hounds would nab it
With deep-throated growl;
You raced undetected where last you elected
To make your projected
Attack on a fowl.

We spotted your mother, a sister, a brother,
Some cousin or other,
And downed one or two,
But you, you old shy one, you sleek-backed and sly one,
You fine-brushed old fly one,
We couldn't get you!

Yet still you are slinking out somewhere I'm thinking,
And cunningly winking
Those eyes of unrest,
Unconquered, undaunted, yet evermore haunted
With thoughts how you're "wanted,"
'Way down in your breast.

We'll hunt you, you rover, o'er hill, bog, and clover,
We'll topple you over,
You child of deceit:
You'll have to be clever, it's now or it's never;
Escape—and for ever
We'll give up the Meet!

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR MRS. P,—I am surprised and a little anxious to hear that my father-in-law has bought a car, after all that he wrote to James about their disadvantages. We were at the Motor Show yesterday, and I could not help feeling somewhat responsible when I realised their dangers for a man of his age. Of course, I was only thinking of James and myself when I wrote to you, and never dreamt that he would expose himself to accidents, chills, nervous disorders, to say nothing of illiberal resentment against the prejudices of democracy. Has he got wire wheels? They are quite the best when the inevitable accident happens. It is unfortunate that while James and I possess the knowledge he only possesses the car. The two should really go together, but I fear that, beginning so late, my father-in-law is hardly likely to acquire the knowledge.

I almost think if I were you I would leave off calling Lord Morley "Honest John." Symbols of popular affection have a tendency, on the retirement of their object, to resolve themselves into unfortunate abbreviations as H.J. or G.O.M. If you should ever find it necessary to assume a personal knowledge of him, here is a true story which may provide the necessary local colour. You may preface it by saying that he has the same sort of wit as Mr. Birrell, though its public appearances are rarer. Not long ago he gave a dinner-party and Mr. W. T. Stead was among the guests. Mr. Stead rashly asked his former Pall Mall colleague how he would define a fanatic? "Stead," said Lord Morley, tapping him lightly on the coat-sleeve, "don't tempt me to illustrations."

Mr. Lewis Harcourt, whose genius for making people comfortable has translated him to the Colonial Office, was, of course, a personal friend of the late King, who often visited him at Nuneham. The house is ugly in itself, in spite of the present owner's improvements in building and tree-planting, but it has beautiful

It proves that the public appreciates the quality and the durability of the 'Koh-i-noor.' But there are still many people who think 4d. a high price to pay for a blacklead pencil. It is because they have not yet used the 'Koh-i-noor'—they are not familiar with its soft silken touch—they know nothing of its remarkable durability and of its entire freedom from grit.

woods and its situation on the river between Oxford and Abingdon draws crowds of trippers on the free Thursdays. The neighbourhood of Nuneham is ultra-loyal. At one of King Edward's last visits, I remember, the Abingdon job-masters made handsome fortunes by hiring out all kinds of antediluvian vehicles to the loyal burghers who wished to be able to say to their grandchildren that they had been to church with the King. It was rather unfortunate that King Edward's first question to his guide during a visit to the Abingdon Council Chamber should have been, "Who was the last King that came here?" The reply came: "King Charles I., Sir, whose head was cut off, you know."

After reading the article by the Chinese Minister in the second edition of "The Pekingese," issued by the Kennel (1s. net), and edited by Miss L. C. Smythe, I am thinking of taking to Pekingese breeding. Solicitors don't seem to appreciate James, and as he says he doesn't care for them as a class, there seems no immediate prospect of briefs. I only hope, in view of his increased majority, the Solicitor-General will think of James and all his hard work at Walthamstow. We could make a lot of money out of Pekingese, if we started them now, since the Kennel Club having fired out Mrs. Ashton Cross, one of the chief breeders, and thus set the Pekin Palace Dog Association by the ears, is likely to be short of the dog, who, according to Imperial decree, must be taught, among other things, to venerate his ancestors. Personally I am a little sorry for the Kennel Club's dilemma. While it is true that they made a mistake, and lost both head and temper too much to rectify it, there is yet a fine consistency in cutting off your own nose to spite somebody else's face.

A Pekingese belonging to one of my friends got poisoned the other day down in Suffolk, where, using the rat plague as an excuse, keepers are laying liberal supplies of poison for anybody that likes to eat it. Tariff Reformers hard up for arguments on the superiority of Germany might hold up the Fatherland's care for the least of its creatures in this respect. In Frankfort, and I daresay elsewhere, everybody secures the services of a professional ratcatcher at the rate of £2 4s. per annum—a moderate enough sum for immunity from unofficial poison.

James and I took part the other night in the Eleusinian mysteries as practised at Caxton Hall by—I have it on his own authority—the rival of Swinburne, Shelley, and Keats, otherwise a young gentleman of the name of Crowley, who has been struck with the bright idea of turning an honest penny by exploiting the rites of Mars. We got there early, for the performer's announcement that the five-guinea tickets were limited to a hundred made us fear a crush, even if we were let in at all, not being scarlet clad, as was requested. We were admitted, even welcomed. There was no crush. The room smelt of burnt paint—I mean it was heavy with Oriental perfumes—and a dim red light was only once outshone when another young gentleman let off some lycopodium powder suddenly, and made us all cough homage to the god. All the young gentlemen wore low-necked dresses, giving striking insight into their collar-bone development. I have had little experience in esoteric rites hitherto, but now I know that they consist for the most part of Eastern readings, emerging from behind a dark curtain to the suggestive rustling of typescript, and delivered in a strong Cockney accent, the faithful being addressed as "Hile brethren!" At intervals, startling to the nervous, a low-necked young man with patent pumps and bare legs may be expected to dance threnodically about the room, a casual goddess to play an insufficiently tuned violin, and Eastern choruses to resound, scorning the bondage of set melody, in Jewish accents to the tune of a German folk-song. Don't be afraid on James's account; it isn't exactly Nonconformist, but then it has also nothing to do with Rome. My only fear is that as it is neither immoral nor indecent, there is not likely to be much competition for the five-guinea seats.—Always your loving daughter-in-law,

VERITY.

THE PASSING BELLE OF FASHION.

("The fantastic fashions of the day are bound to change, and for our part we shall not be sorry."—Lady's paper.)

Ring out, sweet belles, o'er all the earth
The fashion fads of nineteen-ten;
Never you mind just how or when,
But ring them out for all you're worth.

Ring out the high, commodious hat,
That hid you almost to the nose;
How oft have poets sung its woes,
Which cannot well be wondered at!

Ring out the lengthy spike of steel
That keeps the hat upon your hair,
That prods your neighbours everywhere,
Leaving a wound which love may heal.

Ring out, ye belles, with joyful chime
The Chinese shoes upon your feet;
Ring on, as I must oft repeat
Before I finish off this rhyme.

Ring out (to take another tack)
The new fantastic hobble-skirt
That daily leaves you less alert
And ties you in a sort of sack!

Ring, as I've said so oft before,
Ring in the smaller hat instead
That suits you better on the head,
And lets us see your beauty more.

Ring in the newer mode of dress,
Ring in the larger ladies' shoe;
Ring out the false, ring in the true,
And ring in more of gracefulness!

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Tuesday.—A fearsome Channel passage and a joyous landing last night, and Diana and I parted amicably—if gladly. London to the mere critic might have looked dull, but it seemed to me a paradise of peace, of abiding comfort, with affectionate welcomes lurking in every corner. Nita was at the station in a new coat of grey squirrel, with a soft hat to match bearing a crown of furniture velvet decorated with a steel butterfly. I expected her to seek instruction in the whole art of fashion, but she was more prepared to impart it, and she reported a great change during my ten days' absence.

"All the women are upholstered now instead of dressed, chair coverings are much worn, and I have a picture for you of a lovely evening gown of damask curtained with gold net, bordered with gold nails, with bell pulls round the waist—almost a drawing-room suite in itself." And this before we had even reached the motor and she had assured me of the health and cheeriness of Virginia.

As we drove home she told me she had pledged me to attend to-morrow the fifth annual dinner given by the Automobile Co-operative Association, and that she hoped I had a new and worthy frock and a full and proper interest in the accessories before the fact of motoring. Vive Olympia! I replied, sympathetically, and in the language of my late country.

The family forgathered to a woman at supper, suitably robed in attractive teagowns out of respect to my fatigues, and Joan was in proud possession of a new hair ornament by no means incongruous with her easeful garment of bugled ninon. It was a three-cornered cap of diamond trellis outlined with jet and laid flatly upon her neatly-parted hair, a line of jet beads fastening it under a bunch of curls set out most aggressively from the centre of her crown. They are very vagrant curls placed upon old Grecian lines, which she called "Attic." I murmured "Mad Hattic!" but was jeered to silence, and later escorted to bed, with the faithful four sitting on the sofa while I disrobed. They devoured chocolates and I prated of Parisians and dispensed confidences, telling travellers' tales of Diana and the marquis — more tender than true.

Wednesday.—Town is very restful, and I like the mole grey of its streets and its sky and its mud so thoroughly in tune with fashionable prejudice. I should have enjoyed a beautiful lonely morning if Nita had not arrived with a list of friends in the East whom she wants to endow at Christmas. She issued a demand that I should give her ideas for the best fulfilment of her generous desires. To buy Christmas gifts early in November is meeting one's joys—or troubles—halfway, and to be debarred from the privilege of selecting Oriental embroideries cramps my style and robs the task of much of its charm. However, I am always convinced that the more earnestly Nita consults me the more enthusiastically will she follow her own counsel; so I made my propositions without any undue mental effort. She did not leave me till after tea, when she was quite convinced that I had been of great service, and we duly met in the evening at the A.C.A.'s dinner at the Criterion, where Lord Malmesbury was in the chair, and made a speech of much grace, flavoured with much commercialism, and J. Henniker-Heaton epigrammatised with: "Most of the great troubles in life come from letter-writing and vehicular traffic." What a burden of responsibility for the former he carries on his shoulders!

Admiral Fremantle, in proposing the newspaper gentlemen, courteously refrained from calling them the "press gang," and Mr. Cook most wittily replied with a literary fluency which did him much credit, and no doubt gains him much cash. We many times drank the health of the Association, which seemed to be too prosperous to need so much attention, and I gazed in admiration at my opposite neighbour in a charming gown of lavender chiffon draped over a faintly-flowered fabric and outlined about the décolletage with a line of diamonds and silver, and I turned deliberately from my courteous host to bestow some appreciation on a dress of bright royal blue covered with a black chiffon tunic, and on a black rainbow-beaded chiffon gown lined with cerise. While yielding my back view with becoming diffidence to the photographer, I noted the festoons of blossoms which hung in gay profusion from the ceiling, and the clever working in flowers of the national emblems of Belgium, France, Italy, England, and America, who had all sent representatives to the fare; and very good fare it was too, including some delightful singing by Arthur Strugnell and some stories inimitably told by Helen Mar.

"The complete drawing-room suite."

It was past midnight of the clock when we reached home, and even then Nita kept me waiting on the doorstep while she told me a story of Mr. M. from the East, who in an unguarded moment had taken his mother and fiancée to a cinematograph theatre, and was much embarrassed by recognising on the sheet a picture of himself in a dogcart joyously chatting to his native wife!

The marriage between M. and N. will yet take place.

Friday.—Even as Dr. Johnson, whose peregrination down Fleet Street has made history, I took a walk down Bond Street, which seemed a most popular proceeding this special morning, for I met no less than five women of my intimate acquaintance, and amongst them pretty Nelly C., with the latest variety of fur muffs and scarves in musquash lined with brown ratine, a definite change from the white satin or dark brocade, and very smart. The thrifty may substitute brown Pyrenees wool for ratine, and employ their leisure moments in putting a new face or back on their fur oddments; and, doubtless, the prodigal will favourably consider the charms of the new alliance of pale rose pink satin with dark furs.

Other noteworthy items in Bond Street were cerise shoes and stockings. I gladly salute them in combination with black or white frocks, or frocks to match. There is a fancy for lining sealskin hats with pale pink and trimming them with a pink camellia, and I welcome a revival of the long jewelled chain, the jewels large and the chain fairly thick. I must try and find some kindly friend who will present me with a specimen in amethysts of big dimensions of dark purple hue, interspersed with roc pearls.

I lunched at the Savoy with Robert, and with great consideration and considerable difficulty omitted to voice this thought, even when he drove me West, where I had promised to meet Florence and take her shopping at Debenham and Freebody's.

We halted in the department devoted to golf coats, finding mountains of these of a diversity entirely amazing. Long and short, thick and thin, machine made and hand knitted, they were obtainable in every conceivable colour, in silk, real and mercerised; in wool, heavy and light; with belts and without belts; with pointed collars, square collars, and round collars; double breasted and single breasted; almost as varied as the feminine beauties of Sir Charles Wyndham's summary in "Rebellious Susan." No style was omitted, and since all were available I obstinately advised Florence in favour rather of a new Cardigan made in Angola of the finest and softest. This reaches well below the hips, is quite fascinating to the touch, and has a border of a contrasting colour, definitely newer than the golf coat. She yielded and bought one of grey and black stripe, and then, saying she was ne'er content, contented herself by the further purchase of a hand-knitted dark red golf coat down to the knees.

That is the way people always follow my counsel!—seek it, pay nothing for it, and then adopt their own. But my little sister is perchance wise in her generation, for in the country these woollen garments are indispensable, and the vests, hats, and cravats of wool, while deserving the label "serviceable," are vastly becoming.

I approved a gorgeous new golf coat of huntsman's pink which may well be chosen by the daring young girl with a slim figure. Nothing could look better than this with a black skirt and a white shirt, and black beaver hat with a gay pink rose in it.

After "golf-coating" we only had time to snatch tea in the refreshment room—excellent tea, too, with hot crumpets, which I found most soothing—and then Florence rushed for the five o'clock train, threatening to come up to-morrow, when she again wishes to visit Debenham and Freebody's in search of a ready-made evening dress which shall look worth twice as much as she gives for it; and her parting words were "You might hunt around and have some ready for my inspection: you have nothing else to do."

"I have nothing else to do!" I am haunted by a suspicion that there exists a popular fallacy that I am not industrious. Any way, I know one capital evening model at Debenham's, with a beaded kimono bodice and a pleated tunic of ninon, bordered with beads and mounted on satin, for eight and a half guineas. I'll urge the claims of this in cerise, draped and beaded with purple, and I will most kindly telephone my willingness to forward it by post, and thus spare my relative—and hers—the fatigue of another afternoon's shopping.

It's a great advantage of these days to find good clothes and cheap, fit to put on; and in costume, as Hamlet observed of something even more serious, "the readiness is all."

Saturday.—I lunched with Joan at the Ritz, and met a capital mousse of ham, and Sydney, among other distinguished persons, including the Marquis de Soveral, the Duke of Newcastle, and the Duke of Rutland. All the women looked exactly alike in the depths of velvet costumes and hats, the only exception to the rule being a girl in grey satin—she was the silver lining to the fashion cloud of black.

In the evening I was conducted anonymously to The Follies, where I revelled in Pélissier's cleverness and genuine humour respecting the loyalty which doubtless prompted the cessation of his royal pageant at the reign of the most defunct Anne. "Why are no pains and penalties like to be suffered at the hands of desecrated Tudors?" I asked. "There are only extant some brothers of that name—and they are in trade," replied my companion, who has aristocratic proclivities, and knows his Almanach de Gotha by heart.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

A Very Unwise One.—I only had space to give you a line last week. Footwear must always depend upon personal fancy. For my part, I wear the thinnest silk stockings and antelope shoes. Patent leather shoes look nice with thin silk stockings. If you are very cold, of course you must wear boots with black antelope uppers and patent leather goloshes. I find that boots made only of antelope are clumsy and unbecoming. With the dark blue dress I should wear a dark blue close velvet cap, outlined with silver lace and a silver ornament at one side. I should also supply myself with a skunk toque and muff and a collar of skunk to the coat. I will forgive your flattery, this being a fault I joyfully condone. Glixi.—About three inches longer than the neck at each end. Make the centre of tapestry brocade, or of velvet, with a piece of metal lace laid on. Border all round with fur, and wrap the ends one over the other tightly and decorate the outside one with some ornament, either a chrysanthemum in natural colours, or a device in galon or beads. I suggest you write to Debenham and Freebody's, Wigmore Street, for patterns of tapestry brocade, black-grounded with coloured flowers, and, of course, I advise a muff to match, fur and tapestry combined.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

A cookery exhibition gives food for thought as well as showing how tempting, how ingenious, how absurd food for the body can be. The twenty-first Cookery and Food Exhibition was held last week, the exhibits ranging from three meals for six persons, costing 2s. 6d., to a "Table d'Honneur," loaded with utter absurdities and redeemed by some straightforward chocolates which looked so delicious that I loathed the inconvenient sense of honour which kept me from sampling them. The absurdities included a railway engine, complete in every detail, done in sugar, and a pheasant dressed with truffles and so forth, and then garnished in a way which struck me as simply barbarous, with its head and neck and complete tail feathers. There it sat, with lack-lustre eye, not a dish, but a dead body. I became a vegetarian—until I reached a vegetarian table where one or two of the dishes appeared formless and void. There was among the "non-flesh" dishes, however, a remarkably well-moulded and inviting timbale of spaghetti and tomato, and also a shape of macaroni and green peas in jelly, whose only visible fault was that it was called "vegetable brawn." I should have been a vegetarian long ago if I could have had frank, straightforward preparations of fresh vegetables; but those are seldom to be had among "fleshless feeders." Here was one, to all appearance—and it was called brawn!

Among the ornamental exhibits I only remember one with pleasure—a basket of pink and white tulips and green leaves, all done in pulled sugar. It was really a delight to the eye, but many of the others were neither beautiful nor useful. Of what use is a white sugar cathedral with bells and electric light? It would certainly be much more beautiful in some other substance. As for an enormous lobster with a peacock's tail, done in quenelles, and a huge white sugar airship studded with pink sugar roses, and with an edible propeller, such things are neither food, cookery, nor art. They are simply painstaking and very skilful instances of wasted labour.

An interesting section was devoted to trays containing meals for invalids, a competition open only to certificated nurses. Some of these were very daintily set out, but in others the food had not an enticing air.

being of dingy colouring—a detail very important where an invalid has to be tempted. The trays of the Lady Margaret Hospital nurses reached a high level, and the one I picked out as being dainty, tempting, and thoroughly sensible was the work of Nurse Wilkins. It consisted of black currant beverage, fillets of rice, egg custards, and fruit. A vase of violets completed the tray.

The practical housewife found much to interest her in the commercial exhibits round the hall. From Brand's stall, packed with delicacies, she gathered the good news that their essence of beef is found to be a fine specific against sea-sickness. It stands to reason that this would be so, the great difficulty on board being the faintness produced by lack of food and the impossibility of taking food. Brand's jelly essence is the friend in need.

Money breeds money. I saw various cooking utensils made of cast aluminium, or solid nickel, or pure copper, all of which would last for ever, be cleanly, prevent the food from burning, and altogether repay investment at a fabulous rate of interest—if one had the capital to invest. The cast aluminium cooking vessels are admirable, but they cost more than the ordinary ones—that is, the initial cost is more. As for the solid nickel, the pamphlet is discreetly silent as to their price—an omission which warns the housewife to expect that they will be expensive. However, a little expense is worth while, for utensils of superior metal are much safer from a hygienic point of view, and certainly repay in the long run what they cost in the beginning.

Another pamphlet which refrains from giving prices—an annoying thing from the point of view of the seeker after knowledge—is that of a new substitute for butter in cooking. The substitute is tasteless, and it is claimed for it that on all scores, including that of expense, it beats butter and lard out of the lists. At any rate, it issues an attractive little book of recipes, which will lead many on to try it.

After studying this exhibition I wondered why there is any servant question. Everything is arranged to save labour. The very cooking itself is half done before the stuffs are bought. The bottled fruits and tomato preserves, for instance, represent half the labour that used to be the cook's business in such dishes as risotto, tomato soup, and cooked fruit sweets. On the other side of the hall I heard an explanation of a wonderful Australian invention by which washing-up resolves itself into dipping the articles into water and slipping them into a movable tray arranged as a rack. This system does away with dishcloths, mops, wiping, drying, putting away—in fact, it reduces washing up to the level of a passing incident in the day, minimises breakages by 50 per cent., and ensures a clean sink. This millennial discovery, thank goodness, is of British origin, and has revolutionised domestic service in Australia, wherever there is much washing-up to be done. It is known as "The Easy System."

There was more than one method of cleaning silver in a few minutes; there were various arrangements for economising labour on the range, and so on; altogether, it was a pageant of conveniences. I suppose, in the old days, servants had no time to think of or voice their grievances. Their work has been reduced by half from what it used to be, and yet they are more discontented than ever before. The Cookery Exhibition ought to put them in good temper; and it ought to open the eyes of mistresses to a number of ways in which labour can be economised and cleanliness encouraged downstairs.

Internecine differences in the kitchen are among the greatest trials of the housewife. A parlourmaid has been airing her grievances in comparison with the comfortable lot of the butler, who is waited on by the other servants and has £40 or £50 a year; whereas the parlourmaid gets less than £30 a year as a rule, has longer hours and harder work. It certainly is true that in domestic service the men have an easier time than the women. Whether this is by virtue of the uplifting fact that a licence has to be taken out for a man servant or not, I do not know; or perhaps it may be that a butler is expected to have a useful social equipment, to know by instinct as soon as he sees a visitor on the doorstep whether he will be welcome or not to his master, and in various other ways to guard the comfort of his employers. I hear there is quite a run just now on English butlers rather than on the foreigners who were fashionable for a few years, and that £40 or £50 would by no means even begin to pay a family butler "with an air" who enters the service of a newly rich family, bringing to it a knowledge of social conditions and how things should be done which is nothing less than invaluable to his employers. Many a social reputation springs direct from the butler's tact.

Chestnuts are in season, with all their indigestible adorable richness. There is a tea-room in London which charges 2s. per head for tea, but it is well worth it to taste one of their creamed chestnut cakes. They make of greediness a virtue, since even Christian Scientists advocate our loving the good in everything. But there is something hard to beat about the most simple way of cooking chestnuts—the homely roasting. When parboiled first they are simply a dream. Here are a few chestnut recipes which are timely. It is important to note that the end should be cut off each nut before blanching them, otherwise they are liable to burst. The outer shell and the fibrous skin must also be removed before finally boiling them.

Chestnuts au Caramel.—Boil twenty to twenty-five chestnuts, according to their size; rub them through a wire sieve and when cold mix the purée with half its volume of whipped cream, sweetened and flavoured with maraschino. Form the cream into balls. Have a pound of sugar boiled with a pint of water until it begins to turn colour, in which dip the balls, one at a time, and as quickly remove them, placing them on an oiled baking-sheet. Dish the balls in a pyramid, with a little caramel on the dish to prevent them slipping, or use a pastry stand. Garnish them with spun sugar or flots of whipped cream.

Compôte of Chestnuts.—After removing the skins of twenty to thirty chestnuts boil them until half done and then drain them quite dry on a cloth, after which put them into strong boiling syrup, flavoured with vanilla; cover them with white paper and the cover of the stewpan and allow them to stand on a corner of the stove for some hours to finish cooking; this should keep them whole. Then drain off the syrup and reduce it until it is very thick. Put the nuts into a glass dish and pour the syrup over them when it is cold.

Bombe à la Jocelyn.—Boil about eighteen chestnuts, after divesting them of their skins, and rub them through a fine wire sieve; mix the purée with a gill of custard, then with half a pint of whipped cream; add sugar and essence of vanilla to taste; freeze the cream and with it line a bombe mould, inserting the tube cover. Imbed the mould in ice and salt for an hour; then remove the cover and fill the cavity with oranges mixed with lemon jelly; place the plain cover on and again imbed in ice and salt to set the jelly. Turn the mould out on a silver dish and sprinkle it with chopped pistachios. Serve a compôte of oranges round it

Galette à la Lorraine.—Line a French tart tin with short paste in which the yolk of an egg has been mixed; brush the paste with beaten egg, prick it well with a fork, and bake it a delicate brown colour; allow it to cool in the tin before removing. Boil twenty skinned chestnuts and drain them on a cloth. Put a layer of apricot jam, previously mixed with two tablespoonfuls of brandy, in the baked crust, which cover with whipped cream, sweetened and flavoured with vanilla. Rub the chestnuts through a wire sieve on the cream and decorate it tastefully with a border of crystallized fruits and glacé cherries.

Chestnut Trifle.—Split half a dozen penny sponge cakes, spread them with apricot jam, and pack them in a pudding basin; soak the sop with half a pint of sherry and half a wineglass of brandy. Boil twenty skinned chestnuts, strain them and let them cool. Whisk half a pint of cream with sugar and vanilla. Turn the sponge cakes in a mound into a glass dish, cover them entirely with the cream, place a wire sieve over the dish and rub the chestnuts through it on the cream, so that they fall in vermicelli-like form. Arrange a neat border of compôte of oranges.

Crême à la Espagnole.—Rub eighteen boiled chestnuts through a wire sieve, mix them with a gill of sweet custard in which half an ounce of sheet gelatine has been dissolved; in this mix the whipped white of an egg mixed with 2 oz. of hot golden syrup; add maraschino or any nice liqueur to flavour and a gill and a-half of whipped cream. Pour the cream into a mould, which should be lined with sections of oranges in jelly, and when it is turned out put compôte of oranges in syrup round it.

Pouding aux Marrons.—Boil at least twenty large chestnuts with a pinch of salt added to the water. After rubbing them through a sieve mix the purée in a stewpan with a gill of milk, 2 ozs. of butter, and 2 ozs. of castor sugar; stir it on the fire till thick and quite boiling; if it is too stiff add a little milk. Remove it from the fire and mix in the yolks of three eggs, each one separately, add a few drops of essence of vanilla, and, lastly, mix in lightly the stiffly whisked whites of four eggs. Steam the pudding for an hour in a buttered charlotte mould, with an outer band of greased paper 2 ins. higher than the mould, taking care to put a greased paper on the top. Having turned it out, pour round it apricot sauce, which is simply made by mixing a glass of sherry with half a pound of apricot jam and rubbing it through a hair sieve.

In this book the author offers a serious and reasoned warning to his countrymen against the final abandonment of their effective power at sea proposed by the Hague Convention of 1907, and effected by the Declaration of London of 1910, and the Naval Prize Bill now before Parliament. The changes proposed by these Instruments are grave and far-reaching. To examine all the proposed changes historically and practically, and to awaken the country to a sense of the vital necessity for resisting them, is the purpose of this book.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed with the objects contained in its Memorandum of Association, and in particular for the purpose of acquiring a Lease of approximately 600 square miles (nearly 400,000 acres) in the district of Ingwavuma, sometimes called Tongaland, Province of Zululand, Colony of Natal. The Company will also acquire a licence from the owners of the patents to use machinery recently invented by Mr. Leon Guiguet, of Lyons, for extracting Rubber from the indigenous vines which abound on this area.

The Lease is granted by the Minister of Agriculture on behalf of the Government of Natal for a period of 28 years, from 1st January, 1910, during which the sole rights of rubber collection are secured at a rental of £300 per annum, and a royalty of 6d. per lb. on all indigenous vine rubber collected, the working being under the supervision of the Conservator of Forests, who has authorised the cutting of the native Landolphia rubber vines over an area of 20,000 acres per annum.

The Lease is subject to the condition that 40,000 lbs. weight of rubber be extracted before the 31st December, 1913.

The Lease also confers the right to select blocks of land, other than forest land, for the purpose of rubber and other cultivation, such blocks to be granted under leases for 99 years at the further low rental of 3d. per acre per annum, free from royalty except that on rubber from indigenous vines. Such right extends to 5,000 acres in the first instance and afterwards (subject to complying with certain conditions as to planting) to blocks of 2,000 acres at a time.

These rights enable the Company to take up on leases an immense area of territory which could without very great expense be made suitable not merely for cultivating planted rubber, but also for sugar, tobacco, and other produce, all of undoubted great value.

There are many thousands of acres of virgin alluvial soil capable of irrigation, and conveniently situated for transport and shipment of all products.

The property is bounded on the west by the Pongola River (which flows into Delagoa Bay) for a distance of about 50 miles, and on the north by Portuguese territory for about 12 miles.

The district was the subject of an exhaustive report to the Natal Minister of Agriculture by the Tongaland Rubber Commission in 1901, a copy of which is enclosed with the full prospectus.

Mr. J. Gryspeert, who was a Member of the above-mentioned Government Commission and was subsequently employed for over five years under the department of Agriculture and Forestry in Natal, and who has had many years' experience in the rubber fields of Central America, reported under date 12th February, 1910:—"Re the Rubber area in your leased area, IT IS CERTAINLY THE RICHEST IN RUBBER VINES OF ANY FIELDS OF WILD RUBBER I HAVE EVER SEEN. Your leased area I have traversed on foot time and again for careful inspection. The richest portion of the Landolphia covers, I estimate, an area of at least 225 square miles, and is most easy to work, as the vines are sufficiently thick upon the ground, and yield well. TAKING THE ABOVE 225 MILES ALL ROUND, I ESTIMATE 45 VINES TO THE ACRE."

Mr. T. R. Sim, formerly Conservator of Forests for Natal, has also reported favourably on this property. He states that Ceara rubber will grow to perfection over very large portions of the area, and that Mpai (Ficus Utilis) is abundant throughout the district, and yields abundantly a marketable caoutchouc. He further states: "The easily worked nature of the soil, its productiveness, the opportunity for extensive irrigation, the abundant local labour supply, the tropical conditions, and the river transport, together with assured demand for everything grown, render this lease as a whole, including rubber rights, cultural rights, land development rights, and timber possibilities, a most attractive proposition if carried out on a scale large enough to cover all these, and not depending solely on any one of them. Ultimate success depends entirely on efficient local management."

The whole project and the Reports have been studied by the Technical Adviser to the Company, the well-known Continental expert, Mr. G. Van den Kerckhove, who has had a long experience of Landolphia, and from whose Report, dated 30th August, 1910, the following extracts are taken:—

> The Reports justify the conclusion that, "you possess a very large Landolphia forest, of which 144 thousand acres have been examined and found to contain large quantities of rubber-bearing vines and trees; that the soil is rich alluvial, and all of it carries and should be further planted with Landolphia vines; that transport is cheap, the estate is within sixty miles of the railroad to Durban, and the Pongola river, which forms one boundary of the Estate, is navigable to Delagoa Bay; that labour is both cheap and plentiful. 144 thousand acres at least carry from 45 to 150 tappable vines per acre, and when these are cut and the young seedlings given light and air, and other seedlings planted out in a scientific manner under careful supervision, the life of the estate should be illimitable. No matter how large a plant you may provide, you will not be able to keep pace with the continued growth of the rubber vines on the estate."

From tests made with the Guiguet machine in Lyons, it has been proved that the amount of Rubber extracted from vines shows a large increase as compared with the amount extracted by native methods.

Mr. William Chaplin, who is managing the business of the Madagascar Rubber Company, Limited, has estimated that on a conservative basis an average of one kilo (about 2 1-5th lb.) of dry Rubber can be extracted by the machine from the bark of each ten-year-old vine.

Messrs. Baillie and Dobree, of 82, Victoria Street, S.W., who inspected the Guiguet plant at Lyons in March last, reported that:—

> "The machine can extract over 90 per cent. of the Rubber in the bark. . . . The use of the Guiguet machine will enable about ten times the value of Rubber to be obtained from 100 kilos of bark as now obtained by native treatment," and they consider "that it is capable of extracting the Rubber from the bark under the conditions obtaining in the forests in a thoroughly satisfactory manner."

Mr. Dobree, of the above firm, has recently returned from an investigation of the working of the Guiguet machine in the forests of Madagascar, and reports, under date of the 21st October, 1910, as follows:—

> "We are in a position to say that our estimates of the capacity of the machines, and the percentage of rubber extracted, made as the result of our original trials of the Guiguet machine at Lyons, have been fully substantiated by the tests made on Landolphia Rehe bark under actual working conditions in the Menabe forest.
> "The problem of obtaining a suitable plant, capable of being carried by natives through the forests, has been successfully solved."

Messrs. Baillie and Dobree have estimated the cost of extracting Rubber from the cut vine to be 4½d. per lb.

The vines after cutting grow again and become available for re-cutting in about 8 to 10 years' time. It is also possible to largely increase the number of vines by clearing the bush and planting out the seedlings, which grow in great profusion round the roots of the matured vines. Taking Mr. Gryspeert's estimate of an average of 45 vines to the acre, there should be produced from each 1,000 acres of forest about 100,000 lbs. of Rubber. Mr. Chaplin calculates that one Guiguet extracting plant complete, the cost of which is approximately £650 (including steam plant and all accessories), can treat 250 acres per annum, and it is proposed to order in the first instance twenty of these plants, which it is estimated will be sufficient to treat 5,000 acres per annum and thus produce about 500,000 lbs. of Rubber.

An estimate of the probable profits, based on a production of 500,000 lbs. per annum, at a cost, according to Mr. Van den Kerckhove, of 1s. 6d. per lb. (including royalty), is as follows:—

|---|---|---|
| If sold at a profit of | 1/6 per lb. .... | £37,500 |
| " " | 2/6 " .... | 62,500 |
| " " | 3/6 " .... | 87,500 |

In this estimate no account has been taken of the profits to be derived from tapping Rubber trees, various species of which are found in considerable numbers on the above area, or from the leasing or working of irrigated lands.

A brokerage of 8d. per Share will be paid by the Company on subscriptions for Shares identified as coming through brokers and approved agents other than on Underwriters' Subscriptions

It is intended in due course to apply for a special settlement in the Shares on the London Stock Exchange.

The agreements, reports, and other documents referred to in the filed Prospectus, and a print of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, may be seen at the offices of the Solicitors of the Company at any time during the usual business hours on the days on which the list is open.

Prospectuses and Forms of Applications for Shares can be obtained from the Company's Bankers, Solicitors, and Brokers, and at the offices of the Company, and applications will alone be received on the basis of such full prospectus.

The Statements in this Prospectus are taken from and based upon the official Reports published by the Hawthorne Silver and Iron Mines, Limited.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The Hawthorne Silver and Iron Mines, Limited, was formed December 9, 1909, primarily to acquire the properties herein described, to carry on the business of mining PROPERTIES.—The Iron Ore Properties of the Company are located along a branch of the Canadian Pacific 68 miles from Kingston, a port on Lake Ontario, the nearest to market of the Iron Ore regions of Canada, and several hundred miles nearer to the principal markets of the United States than the present largest sources of supply.

EXTENT OF PROPERTIES.

| | Acres. | Acres. |
|---|---|---|
| Caldwell Purchase (Wilbur Properties) | 5,672 | |
| Owned under Miner's Licence | 100 | 5,772 |
| Other properties controlled | 11,032 | |
| Water power owned | 433 | 11,465 |

The Silver Properties comprise 147 Mining Claims of 5,863 acres in South Lorrain Township; and these properties are owned under the Mining Laws of Ontario, and are not subject to the payment of any royalties.

WATER POWER.—A splendid Water Power, estimated by the Engineer to furnish about 4,000 horse-power, adequate for the operation of all the iron properties by electricity, is owned by the Company, this Water Power being only six miles from the Iron Mines.

DEVELOPMENT, PLANTS, AND PRODUCTION.—Dr. Bell reports: "The extent of the Ore bodies will easily make possible the production of 1,000,000 tons per annum.

Chief Engineer McNulty reports: "You have, in my opinion, iron ranges capable of yielding several million tons annually for many years to come."

R. Carr-Harris referring to the "big bed" of the Wilbur Mine, reports: "The gigantic mass of Ore is workable . . . for a distance of a mile and a quarter, which renders it easy to extend a succession of hoisting plants in front of this long iron seam; hence the rate of production is not in any way limited to the quantity which could be extracted from only two or three shafts, but . . . can be accelerated to any extent desired by simply placing additional hoisting machines. . . ."

QUALITY OF ORE. The general character of the Ore from all parts of the property is of high grade, pure enough for making the highest grade of metal. The average of 10 assays given in Dr. Bell's Report shows 55.98 per cent. Metallic Iron, and the assay of an average sample from 5 car-loads taken from the Wilbur Mine gave 58.52 Metallic Iron; Phosphorus, 0.006; Sulphur, 0.013; Titanium, 0. This is high-grade Bessemer Ore.

SILVER PROPERTIES.—A shaft is being sunk at Treacy Lake on Vein No. 823, where, as stated in the Engineer's Report, assays taken from samples found on the surface showed native Silver content as high as $876 per ton, and where four additional veins were discovered this summer in close proximity to each other.

DIAMOND DRILLING.—Four Diamond Drills are at work proving up the properties.

PLANTS.—The initial Working Plant of a daily capacity of 1,000 tons is located on the Wilbur Iron Properties, at the village of Wilbur, at the mouth of the Main Working Shaft, and consists of hoisting and crushing plant, Ore bin, and all necessary machinery and buildings, with offices, boarding-houses, store-houses, and other buildings. Spur tracks of the Kingston and Pembroke Railway run to the plant.

A Second Plant of 1,000 Tons Daily Capacity is in course of preparation at the "Vertical Shaft," some 1,565 feet north of the Main Shaft, and is expected to be completed in January.

ESTIMATE OF WORKING PROFITS.—Taken from the Engineers' Reports. The estimate of profits is based upon a plant of 1,000 tons daily production as a unit, and is here confined to the iron properties alone.

Annual net profit of one plant of 1,000 tons daily production, 300 working days, $795,000 (£160,000).

Two plants, each of 1,000 tons daily production, should therefore yield an annual profit of $1,590,000 (£320,000), equal to more than 10 per cent. on the full share Capital, or 15 per cent. on the present outstanding Capital.

Each additional plant of 1,000 tons daily production should therefore add to the annual Profits an amount equal to 5 per cent. on the entire Capital.

WORKING CAPITAL.—For immediate purposes Capital is required for the installation of the second plant of 1,000 tons per day additional capacity, for additional construction to and equipment of the already existing Docks at Kingston, and for general purposes of development and proving up the Iron and Silver properties, for all which the proceeds of the present issue will be used.

PRODUCTION.—The mining of Iron Ore commenced on July 12, and the "stock pile" has been steadily accumulating.

The Docks will be completed and made ready for the shipment of Ore during the Winter.

All the Canadian Markets are within easy reach of the Mines.

To Buffalo five million tons of Ore are at present shipped annually from the Mesaba Ranges, more than 1,000 miles away.

A NEW RUSSIAN OILFIELD.

Maily-Say, Ferghana, Russian Turkestan.

In the province of Ferghana, Russian Turkestan, about forty-seven miles from Andijan, the present terminus of the Transcaspian Railway, is an estate known as Maily-Say. This estate was granted by the Russian Government to the late Prince Khilkoff (formerly Minister of Russian Highways of Communication) by virtue of the Imperial Decisions of May 8, 1905, December 30, 1906, and August 11, 1907, and Prince Khilkoff took formal possession of the property on October 6, 1907. In course of time Prince Khilkoff died, and under his will the concession was transferred to Madame Valoueff, which transfer was duly approved by the Russian Ministry of Commerce and Industry on June 10, 1909. Although it might appear, because the property is situated in Russian Turkestan, that it is difficult of access, this is not so. Trains de luxe start from Moscow and Orenburg, and passing through Tashkend, run as far as Andijan. There is, therefore, very easy access to the property, which can be reached from London in about thirteen days.

The province of Ferghana is to all intents and purposes practically a new Oil Field—it is unknown except to those interested directly in oil, and one might, therefore, hesitate to believe that it is an oil field, or if it is that it could be worked at a profit, but such is the case.

As far back as 1891 the Geologist Michenkoff, in an official report made by the order of the Governor General of Turkestan, gave with precision the position of the petroliferous deposits of this region, and also drew up a map of the district.

Three years ago, that is to say since the end of the Russo-Japanese War, Prince Khilkoff, the eminent Russian Minister who for twelve years directed the Department of Public Works with prodigious activity, and who gave proof of an authority and initiative which have made his name popular in the whole of Europe, as well as in Asia and America, personally interested himself in the Boring operations. Two wells were sunk under his direction.

The first well, which was only 6 ins. in diameter, encountered naphtha at a shallow depth, and immediately a second well of a more considerable size (14 ins.) was undertaken.

In January, 1908, a telegram announced at St. Petersburg that the second bore then in progress, and the most important, had reached the naphtha and quite suddenly had given place to a considerable eruption. Prince Khilkoff went immediately to the spot

The two wells are very close to each other, situated on the right bank of the Naryn, 15 kilometres from this river, above the point where it joins the Kara-Daria, in a region of little hills, 1,450 ft. high, on the lesser chains of the Sousamir Mountains.

The first well encountered flowing naphtha at a depth of 82 sagenes (172 metres or 573 ft.) and gave 2,000 poods (72,000 lbs.) of oil in twenty-four hours.

The second well, that which has the greater diameter, reached the naphtha at a depth of 98 sagenes (206 metres or 687 ft.). It has been giving since January, 1908 continuously, a jet of oil equal to 7,000 poods (252,000 lbs.) in twenty-four hours.

Ferghana Naphtha is of a different quality to that of Baku, and contains very light benzines and a large quantity of paraffin. The analysis of the Ferghana Naphtha shows the presence of :—

6 per cent. of light and heavy benzine
30 per cent. of petroleum
56 per cent. of residues and 6 per cent. of paraffin.

OIL FUEL.

RUSSIAN STATE RAILWAY RETURNS.

The latest returns issued by the Russian State Railways for the year 1907 give in Table V. the following particulars of OIL FUEL consumed by the two lines traversing Central Asia, viz. :—

| | Poods. | Tons. |
|---|---|---|
| Page 8, No. 15, Sredne-Aziatskaja Doroga (Mid Asiatic Railway)... | 8,404,540 | ... 135,490 |
| Total consumed in 1907 by both lines | 17,270,344 | ... 278,420 |

The Russian State Railway returns for 1908 have not yet been published, but it has been ascertained that the two Central Asiatic Lines consumed in 1908 the following quantities of oil fuel :—

| | Poods. | Tons. |
|---|---|---|
| Mid Asiatic Railway ..... | 8,356,883 | ... 134,727 |
| Tashkend Railway ..... | 9,870,226 | ... 159,125 |
| | 18,227,111 | ... 293,852 |

thus showing an increase of over 15,400 tons for that year, and owing to the rapid development of commerce and industry in Russian Asia, and particularly in the Ferghana Province, the consumption should steadily increase from year to year. As an example of the striking and rapid expansion of the two Railway Lines in question and the industries in the regions they traverse, it may be stated that the Mid Asiatic Railway alone handled for their own consumption of fuel oil and supplies transported to mills, factories, etc., the following quantities :—

| | Poods. | Tons. |
|---|---|---|
| 1900 ..... | 5,718,556 | ... 92,193 |
| 1901 ..... | 6,685,434 | ... 107,780 |
| 1902 ..... | 8,210,471 | ... 132,366 |
| 1903 ..... | 17,736,041 | ... 285,918 |

It is thus seen that as early as 1903, one line alone handled nearly 18,000,000 poods (290,160 tons) for its own fuel consumption and the requirements of the industrial and manufacturing community for which it mainly operates. From the foregoing figures it is seen that this quantity was exceeded in 1908 by both Railway Lines for their own fuel consumption alone.

In addition to the two lines above mentioned, the projected line that is to link up the Aral-Khiva Steamboat Service with Turkestan and Siberia will still further increase the demand for oil by the railways, to say nothing of the great incentive to industry and the enormous development of the untold wealth of Turkestan that will result therefrom. The awakening of Turkestan, which began with the completion of the Central Asiatic Railway, has created a demand for oil that it will be difficult to cope with, and the present cry for more oil will become even more persistent and pressing in Central Asia.

The loans floated in London at the end of September this year, under the sanction and guarantee of the Russian Imperial Government, for the purpose of providing funds for the construction and working of the Troitsk Railway and Kokand Namangan Railway, issued in the shape of 4½ per cent. Bonds, are an earnest of the above-mentioned projects for the building of a network of lines for the further opening up and development of Central Asia.

THE DEMAND FOR OIL IN FERGHANA.

Ferghana is in the very heart of Central Asia in a densely-populated and fertile region containing several large towns, the principal one being Tashkend with 200,000 inhabitants. Lighting is a brisk and remunerative business; every little hut is illuminated by at least two petroleum lamps, while most houses have a great variety of lamps burning all night. This alone constitutes a ready and steady market close to the wells, but in addition a big caravan trade is carried on with the outlying provinces and countries, all of which are densely populated and will doubtlessly also become good markets.

In addition to the two Central Asiatic Railways, which could consume more than the total output during the first year or two after laying down a pipe-line, a far more remunerative outlet could be found in the numerous cotton mills, cotton-seed oil factories, rice mills, and other factories in the region traversed by the Railway, all of which have attained the highest development and prosperity. The total production of cotton alone in the Ferghana Province for 1907 was 4,000,000 poods (64,480 tons) out of a total of 5,150,000 poods (83,020 tons) for the whole of Russian Turkestan.

PROSPECTUS.

OBJECTS OF THE COMPANY.

The Company was formed to acquire the extensive timber rights held under Timber licences issued by the Government of the Province of British Columbia, comprising an area of 49 square miles, situate in Rupert District on Vancouver Island, including the rights of cutting, carrying away, manufacturing and selling the timber on the limits numbered as follows:—Section 33,717 to 33,734 inclusive, 34,527 to 34,538 inclusive, 39,684 to 39,698 inclusive, 36,308, 36,309, 40,804, and 40,805.

POSITION OF PROPERTIES.

The properties of this Company are situated on the north-western shore of Vancouver Island, inside Quatsino Sound, which forms a deep-water protected harbour, sufficiently deep for ocean-going vessels. It is difficult to overestimate the value of this situation of the property as regards commercial shipping of the lumber, as, sooner or later, Quatsino Sound, being one of the few available deep-water harbours in the north of Vancouver Island, is practically certain to become the Northern terminus of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway now being constructed by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The Canadian Press Association cable from Montreal, October 19, ran as follows:—

"Montreal, October 19.

"The C.P.R. Company is preparing to extend the Esquimalt and Nanaimo line to the north end of the Island of Vancouver."—Canadian Press Association.

The timber licences were granted and are held under "Special Timber Licence Act." Each licence covers a maximum of 640 acres (one square mile). The annual tax payable to the Government is $140 per square mile, equal to about 11d. per acre. The titles have been examined and approved on behalf of the Company by Messrs Tait and Brandon, Victoria, British Columbia.

The properties have been inspected and reported upon by Mr. John Finn, timber expert and cruiser, of St. Paul, Minn., whose report contains the following:—

"There are three rivers running through the timber, so that the timber can be logged very economically. Ocean-going vessels can come to the Mill site, one of the finest harbours on the coast. I spent four months with my crew in cruising this tract of timber in 1907. The timber runs as follows:—80 per cent. Cedar, 35 per cent. Fir and Hemlock, 35 per cent. Spruce. Total amount of timber, 1,097,000,000 (one thousand and ninety-seven million feet)."

The following letter has been received by the East Indies Syndicate from Mr. W. Innis Paterson, who is an entirely disinterested party as regards the present offer of shares. Mr. Paterson is connected with some of the most important Timber Companies in British Columbia, amongst which are the Paterson Timber Co., Limited, The Terminal Lumber and Shingle Company, The Cascade Mill Company and The British Canadian Wood Pulp and Paper Company, Limited:—

"To the East Indies Syndicate, Limited, 13, Sherborne Lane, E.C.

"Gentlemen,—Answering your inquiry as to the location of the best timber areas in British Columbia, I might say that the more accessible areas on the East Coast of Vancouver Island and coast of the main land have been very largely logged off, and I consider Quatsino Sound and the North End of Vancouver Island, for stand of timber and ideal conditions for logging, is the best district I have visited in British Columbia, and I think that I am as familiar with timber areas in British Columbia as almost any other person in the province.

"(Signed) W. INNIS PATERSON.

"Dated October 14th, 1910."

QUANTITY AND DESCRIPTION OF TIMBER.

It will be seen by reference to Mr. John Finn's report that the Company owns 1,097,000,000 feet of timber.

|---|---|
| 30 per cent. cedar ..... | equal to 329,100,000 feet |
| 35 per cent. fir and hemlock ..... | equal to 383,950,000 feet |
| 35 per cent. spruce ..... | equal to 383,950,000 feet |
| Total | 1,097,000,000 feet. |

CEDAR.—Cedar trees grow to a large diameter of from 2 to 15 feet at the butt, and rise to an average of about 64 feet in height. Cedar is extensively used for making doors, sash and interior furnishings for houses, and is also largely used throughout the world for shingles for roofing and other building purposes.

FIR.—Fir trees grow from 20 inches to 12 feet in diameter and from 60 to 100 feet in height clear of limbs. It is principally used for beams and heavy construction work. It has a beautiful grain, and takes a fine finish.

HEMLOCK.—Sometimes called Alaskan Pine, is generally free from imperfections, is tall, clean and sound, of great tensile strength, and a good wood for building purposes.

SPRUCE.—A wood common to all localities, but of exceptional quality in British Columbia. It grows large, tall, and clean, instances being known where one tree will scale 20,000 feet. It is largely used for box timber, and is also in demand for building purposes. It is also the best wood for the manufacture of pulp.

SMALL RISK OF FIRE.

One of the most important facts in connection with the properties of the Company is the absence of fire hazard, for the properties lie on and in close proximity to the Sound, and are therefore subject to the damp atmosphere from the sea. It is of interest to note from the United States Government Precipitation Maps that the Island of Vancouver is reported as having the heaviest rainfall of any locality in the North American Continent, and consequently serious forest fires are practically unknown in this district.

Mr. James O. Cameron has been appointed Managing Director of the Company. Mr. Cameron is an experienced lumberman, and is thoroughly familiar with manufacturing and the market conditions governing the operation of timber Companies.

SAW MILLS AND ESTIMATE OF PROFIT.

It is the purpose of this Company immediately to construct and equip a Saw Mill with an annual capacity of 30,000,000 feet board measurement, which would, it is estimated, soon realise an annual profit of $7·50 per 1,000 feet, allowing for all expenses.

Basing the annual profits upon this output, the following estimate is made:—

30,000,000 feet of Timber at $7·50 per 1,000 = $225,000 = £45,000, sufficient to pay over 20 per cent. in dividends after establishment expenses have been paid.

From estimates already received, it is found that the Mill can be erected and fully equipped for the sum of $125,000 (£25,000).

The price paid by the Company for its properties is $800,000, which will be payable as to $500,000 in shares and $300,000 in cash. The Vendor, however, has agreed that Fifty thousand dollars of the $300,000 is to remain in the hands of the Company, without interest, up to a period of one year after the Mill has commenced operations, so as to provide a fund for working capital.

The shares now offered are to complete the payment for the properties, provide money for the erection of the Mill, and further working capital. There are no preference or founders' shares and no debentures ahead of the shares now offered.

On the capitalisation of the Company it will be seen that the property stands at under $1 per 1,000 feet on the estimated amount of timber, which is considerably a lower capitalisation than most of the timber properties which have been floated on the London market in recent years.

It is anticipated that the Mill will be erected and in full operation during the year of 1911. In the meantime, having regard to the increasing demand for timber, and the comparatively few accessible tracts remaining allowing of cheap transportation and marketing, it is thought that the timber companies who have such properties are conservative in estimating that the cash value of their properties is automatically increasing at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum. It is considered that the position and property of this Company, with its direct connection with the world's markets by ocean vessels, and the fact that Quatsino Sound will probably be the deep-water terminus of the new line now being constructed through the island, justify the estimate that the property of this Company will show a similar increase.

If an allotment is not made to any applicant the deposit will be returned in full through the post by cheque, at the applicant's risk, and if an allotment is made for less than the amount applied for, the balance of the application money will be appropriated toward the sum due on allotment.

Failure to pay any of the instalments when due will render all previous payments liable to forfeiture.

It is intended to apply in due course to the London Stock Exchange for an official quotation and special settlement in the shares now offered.

A brokerage of 5 per cent. will be paid on allotments made in respect of applications bearing the stamps of bankers or brokers.

Prospectuses and forms of application may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors, and at the offices of the East Indies Syndicate, Limited (nominees of the Vendor), 13, Sherborne Lane, London, E.C.

TRUTH PUZZLE No. 1,656.

I am indebted for the subject of the following competition in part to the suggestion of a correspondent and in part to a conversation which I overheard the other day in the train, when a gentleman expressed the opinion that, though he had travelled over almost all the railways in England, he had never taken a more beautiful railway journey (from the scenic point of view) than that along the Avon Valley between Bradford-on-Avon and Bath.

It at once occurred to me that here was the making of a highly interesting competition; and I have decided to offer this week the usual Prize of Two Guineas to that competitor who shall prove most successful in supplying a solution to the following problem:—

WHAT ARE THE THREE MOST BEAUTIFUL RAILWAY JOURNEYS (FROM THE SCENIC STANDPOINT), EMBRACING, EACH, A STRETCH OF NOT MORE THAN TEN MILES, TO BE FOUND IN ENGLAND?

N.B.—"England" is to be strictly interpreted. Possibly we may give Wales, Scotland, and Ireland each a turn at some future date.

The prize award will be by plebiscite.

Competitors are requested not to enter into reasons for their particular choices, but merely to specify them as briefly as possible, consistently with identification.

The example of a beautiful railway journey quoted above is eligible.

No competitor may submit more than one solution, and all solutions must reach TRUTH office by the first post on Monday, November 21.

OBITUARY.

It is with great regret that I have to record the death of an old and valued competitor in the person of VENI, whose real name was Dr. H. J. Buck, and who died at his residence, 1, Springfield, Upper Clapton, on October 27 last.

Dr. Buck had been confined to his bed for many months, and I hear from a member of his family that during his long illness, "The Puzzles in TRUTH have been the greatest boon and blessing to him." I have now before me his application for a share of prize money which he had won, written by himself on the very day before he died.

VENI will be much missed in these pages, where his nom-de-plume has been so long familiar. I would take this opportunity of expressing my sympathy with his widow and family in their bereavement.

This Company was formed to acquire the Bullfinch Gold Mines, consisting of seven mining leases in the Yilgarn Goldfield, Western Australia, having a total area of about 145 acres, situated about 23 miles north-east of Southern Cross on the main railway line from Perth to Kalgoorlie.

The mines were discovered in November, 1909, by Messrs. D. L. Doolette and C. Jones; work was begun on same in April, 1910, and the development done since then has disclosed a property of sensational richness.

According to the cabled Press reports of the speech of the Premier of Western Australia at the opening of the Western Australian Parliament on October 25, 1910, in referring to the property he said:—

"Even Kalgoorlie and the Golden Mile sink into insignificance when one listens to reports regarding this property, which bids fair to eclipse anything discovered in the history of the State. So good, indeed, are the reports from a trustworthy source that they are almost beyond credence. A tract of country for about ten miles has been pegged out almost continuously between the Corinthian and Bullfinch Mines. At Bullfinch, the centre, 80 leases, representing 2,100 acres, and at Golden Valley and Corinthian, in the same locality, 13 leases, representing 224 acres, and seven leases, representing 168 acres respectively, have been applied for."

Writing on September 11 from Perth, Mr. D. L. Doolette, who is one of the owners and general manager of the mines, stated that they had discovered what he believed to be one of the richest bonanzas in Western Australia; that he had sunk in ore on the lode to a depth of 100 ft., the average from the surface to 65 ft. being about 6 ozs.; below 65 ft. samples of daily baggings had ranged between 11 and 20 ozs. to the ton. At No. 2 shaft on the same lode, 40 ft. south-east of No. 1, at a depth of 43 ft., the whole of the shaft was in sensationally rich quartz, probably worth quite 20 ozs. to the ton, and he expressed himself at that date that within twelve months he would have taken out £100,000 and have a million in sight.

The first crushing of 60 tons gave a net return of over £1,300, and a further crushing from the mine on October 14 of 240 tons gave a net yield of £6,400.

On September 12 Mr. Doolette cabled: "Bullfinch in depth the ore is becoming richer: at 100 ft. level the width of same is 16 ft., averaging 6 ozs. of gold per ton"; and on September 18 he cabled: "Bullfinch for the full width of the No. 2 shaft the ore is exceedingly rich, 20 ozs. of gold per ton."

On October 14 Mr. Doolette cabled that they were at present producing large quantities of ore which would average 20 oz. to the ton.

On November 2 Mr. Doolette further cabled as follows: "Tonnage and estimated value above the 100 ft. level No. 1 shaft and 50 ft. level No. 2 shaft 10,000 tons, £400,000. At 100 ft. level No. 1 shaft have driven upon the vein a distance of 40 ft. north; the value is 12 ozs. across 12 ft. taken. In sinking the No. 2 shaft have met with western wall at 56 ft.; distance driven in crosscut since is 20 ft. Safe estimated value 20 ozs.; the last 300 tons bagged averaged 22 ozs."

In reply to a request for an opinion on the mines, Mr. Vincent F. Shallcross, M.E., of Perth, W.A. (who acquired an interest in the property shortly after its discovery), cabled, under date October 31: "Present developments fully justify estimate. 100 ft. level to surface from present developments will show profit of £250,000. From present development ore increases in value in depth. Considering the whole of the circumstances, including several ore bodies parallel with, mine promises exceedingly well for the future."

The King and Queen are expected to arrive at Windsor Castle from Sandringham on Saturday or Monday next. Windsor is to be the headquarters of the Court during the winter, and their Majesties will come up to Buckingham Palace for the season at the end of January.

During the approaching residence of the Court at Windsor numerous guests will be entertained at the Castle by their Majesties, including the Ambassadors and several of the other Chefs de Mission, the Ministers, and some of the ex-Ministers, and a number of official personages "of light and leading." There are not likely to be many private guests during the present winter. The King will shoot over the extensive Crown preserves in and around Windsor Great Park, but the party will usually be limited to members of the Royal Family and the equerries and other members of the household-in-waiting.

The King and Queen will pay a strictly private visit to Lord and Lady Mount Stephen next month at Brocket Hall.

The Coronation was originally fixed for Wednesday, June 21, but the ceremony has been postponed until Thursday, the 22nd, in order to suit the Court arrangements. The King and Queen will return to Buckingham Palace, after spending Ascot race week at Windsor Castle, on Monday, June 19, and the new arrangement for the Coronation will leave a clear interval of two days for the arrival and reception of foreign Princes and other official guests, which is much more convenient for all concerned. The foreign Princes will all have arrived in London on the night of Tuesday, June 20, and the next day will be devoted to the round of formal visits which is an indispensable feature on such occasions, while at night there will be the State banquet at Buckingham Palace.

There is no truth in the statement of a weekly journal that King Edward requested his son "to fix his Coronation for the earliest possible moment." A Coronation cannot take place until a year has elapsed since the demise of the Crown, and it must be fixed for a convenient date, which means some time in the summer.

More than eighteen months elapsed between the death of George III. and the Coronation of George IV., and when William IV. ascended the throne the interval was about fifteen months. William IV. happened to die in June, so that Queen Victoria's Coronation could take place a little over twelve months after her Accession.

It is rather funny to hear of a "High Colonial Dignitary" informing a morning paper that at the Coronation the oath "will for the first time for centuries be free from discord," so that there will be no "disturbing feelings." The High Colonial Dignitary is obviously in a condition of abysmal ignorance on the subject, for he must have confused the Coronation oath with the Accession declaration.

---

Queen Alexandra will probably reside at Sandringham for about two months, after which her plans are uncertain, but it is not expected that she will settle at Marlborough House for the season until late in the spring.

---

The Queen of Norway and her son left Buckingham Palace on Saturday for Appleton House, where she is expected to stay for between four and five weeks. King Haakon will come to England next month in time to join King George's party at Sandringham for pheasant and wild-fowl shooting. The King and Queen of Norway are to leave on their return to Norway about Tuesday, December 20, after a short visit to their Majesties at Windsor Castle.

---

A weekly journal informs its readers that King Manuel is expected to arrive in London shortly and that King George has offered him apartments during his visit in Buckingham Palace or Kensington Palace. Of course, this is a foolish invention, which can only be founded in fathomless ignorance, for no such offer would be thought of by any responsible person. The Court will follow the precedent of 1848 in respect to the exiled King of Portugal. Lord Palmerston then drew up an elaborate memorandum on the position which should be taken by the Court in intercourse with Louis Philippe and his family, and his views met with the approval of Prince Albert.

---

Claremont House is to be in the hands of workmen for some months, so the Duchess of Albany is to pass the early part of the winter at Windsor, and the King has placed Frogmore Lodge at her disposal. The Duchess will probably stay at Windsor until the beginning of February, when she contemplates going to Cannes for a few weeks. There is no foundation whatever for the statement in an evening journal that Frogmore Lodge is to be granted next year to Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck. It is funny to read that Frogmore is unsuitable as a winter residence through "its nearness to the river." The place stands high above the level of the river, from which it is more than a mile distant. The "exceptionally lovely gardens" near Frogmore belong to Windsor Castle, of which the Lodge is officially a part.

---

Princess Louise has returned to Kensington Palace from Roseneath. H.R.H. is going shortly to Windsor on a visit to Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge.

---

The King and Queen of Roumania have been passing the autumn at the Castle of Pelesch, their beautiful domain on the wooded slopes of the Carpathians. Their Majesties are both in feeble health. King Charles has not made his usual cure at Ragatz, and Queen Elizabeth has given up her annual visit to Neuwied. There is not a particle of foundation for the report, recently circulated in the press, that the King and Queen of Roumania are expected to pay a State visit to England next year after the Coronation.

His Majesty has appointed Captain George Crichton, Coldstream Guards, to be Assistant Comptroller in the Lord Chamberlain's department. The work of this department has not been so well done of late years as it was in the days of Sir Spencer Ponsonby Fane, and the retirement of Sir Daniel Tupper was unfortunate, as he was thoroughly acquainted with the whole routine of the business. The present officials are comparatively inexperienced, which is the more unfortunate inasmuch as the work of the department is both heavy and difficult during the first two years of a new reign.

---

The King has approved of the appointment of Major and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Dobell, Royal Welsh Fusiliers, to be an aide-de-camp to His Majesty. The King's aides-de-camp (both naval and military) will have special duties assigned to them on the day of the Coronation.

---

The German Government has for the first time appointed a Naval Attaché to its Embassy at Vienna.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

Lord and Lady Aberdeen made several public appearances last week and many speeches in Dublin, Belfast, and less important places. Great attention to the northern capital has marked the present viceregal "reign." Lord and Lady Aberdeen are credited with an ardent desire to bring the "black north" out of its blackness, and to leaven its Orangeism with the more liberal, not to say radical, principles of the Presbyterianism prevalent in their countries. The tradition of Ulster has never been one of sweet reasonableness, but the present government in Ireland makes its appeal through a Presbyterian and Nonconformist Lord Lieutenant, Chief Secretary, Under Secretary, and, last but not least, the Head of the "Department," Mr. T. W. Russell.

On Monday Lord and Lady Aberdeen opened an exhibition of engravings in the Royal Hibernian Academy, organised by the president, Mr. Dermod O'Brien, and also by Captain Wilkinson, Ulster King-of-Arms. The exhibition was disappointing with regard to the school of Irish engravers other than the mezzotinters. Captain Wilkinson, himself a very fine designer and engraver of armorial bearings, book plates, etc., has a leaning to modern engravings not altogether shared by many on account of the artistic photography which runs them so close.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen also performed the ceremony of opening the Arts and Crafts Society Exhibition, the president, Lord Mayo, being in the chair on the occasion, when Lord Aberdeen made a speech. Those present included the Duchess of St. Albans (who takes much interest in the reviving arts and crafts of her native land), the Dowager Lady Mayo, Lady Eva Wyndham Quin, Lady Mayo, Lady Lyttelton, and Lady Nutting.

The political situation, like the east wind in spring, became so penetrating last week that society felt the chill of a possibly near disturbance of social arrangements. Meanwhile, however, there was much festivity, more or less throughout the country. The Headfort theatricals drew crowds to the Kells Court House on two nights, and made quite a stir in Meath. Amongst the party staying at Headfort with Lord and Lady Headfort, and all performers in the play, were Lord and Lady Farnham, Lord Fred Conyngham, Sir Anthony and Lady Weldon, Lady Milbanke, and Mr M. Arnott. Amateur theatricals not unfrequently fail to go beyond affording amusement to the performers. It was quite otherwise on this occasion, when in the "School for Scandal" Lady Headfort and Sir A. Weldon respectively played Lady Teazle and Sir Peter. Lord Farnham's father before him was an admirable amateur actor, well known in Dublin society, in the days when he was the popular "Somie" Maxwell.

Lord and Lady Southampton are settled at Kilfane, Co. Kilkenny, for the season, Lord Southampton being Master of the East Kilkenny hounds. He has had a fancy for hunting in Ireland, since he married at St. Patrick's Cathedral in Dublin the eldest daughter of Lord Zetland, who was, at the time, Lord Lieutenant. Kilfane was the family residence of a baronet branch of the Powers. Two young brothers, successive baronets died in South Africa during the Boer War. The present holder of the baronetcy is their uncle, Sir George Power, who was well known as a charming singer, when he took the leading tenor part in the first production of "H.M.S. Pinafore" in London.

Amongst the principal shooting parties of the week were those of Lord and Lady Granmore and Browne at Castlemacgarrett, in the West, where Lord and Lady Granard and Sir Charles and Lady Barrington were guests, and Lord and Lady Farnham's in Cavan, which included Lord and Lady Massareene and Lord and Lady Powerscourt. Lord Farnham is a lately elected representative Peer of Ireland, as also is Lord Ashtown, who is at Woodlawn, where the shooting is excellent. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Stubber's party in Queen's County included Lord and Lady Ormonde, Lady Constance Butler, Lord John Hamilton, Hon. Clare Hamilton, and Lord Gifford. Mr. H. Stubber is the brother-in-law of Lord Stalbridge, whose second wife is the younger of the two handsome Miss Stubbers, who were beauties many years ago at the Viceregal Court, where so much beauty graduated in the old days.

Whilst last week saw the lordly world at "play," it also brought back to Ireland "the ministers of human fate." Mr. Redmond arrived in Dublin, where Mr. Dillon has been staying for some time. The position of the Nationalist leaders in Ireland is a very curious one, and never quite understood out of the country. Society rigorously boycotts them; even the Lord Lieutenant has no power to make the slightest change in this attitude. Mr. Redmond and Mr. Dillon are not only gentlemen by birth but by nature, and highly cultured, especially Mr. Dillon. They are as resolutely cold-shouldered by the classes as if they were unfit, from birth and breeding, to associate with them; in fact, as if they were "corner boys." But such has always been the fate of those who took up the people's cause in Ireland and were not open to official and other blandishment. The principle at the bottom of this treatment is akin to that of blackguarding the plaintiff's attorney when you have a bad case.

The Duke and Duchess of Wellington have taken up their residence at Ewhurst Park, near Basingstoke, for the winter. This place was let for many years to the late Lord Alexander Russell, and it has been occupied since the termination of his tenancy by the Duke and Duchess of Wellington, as Strathfieldsaye is closed.

Lord and Lady Knollys have been stopping at Eastbourne since they left St. James's Palace, where they stayed for three weeks after leaving Balmoral. They will reside at the Winchester Tower, Windsor Castle, for several weeks during the winter. Lord Knollys has consented to defer his resignation of the office of principal private secretary to the King until the middle or end of July. Lord Knollys went to Sandringham on Saturday.

Lord and Lady Leicester have been receiving a shooting party at Holkham Hall, including Lord and Lady Dartmouth, Lord Herbert and Lady Beatrice Herbert, Lord and Lady Savile, and Sir Savile and Lady Crossley. Partridges are very scarce in Norfolk this season, but heavy bags of pheasants and wildfowl are always obtained at Holkham. It was settled last winter that King Edward and Queen Alexandra were to be the guests of Lord and Lady Leicester at Holkham Hall next month for several days.

Mr. Tracey Elliott, who died at Plymouth last week, was the son of Captain Tracey, who earned a great reputation in the early part of Queen Victoria's reign as a most successful prison governor. He introduced many important reforms into the old system of prison administration, and he was an intimate friend of Charles Dickens, who paid him a high compliment in "American Notes." Mr. Tracey Elliott assumed his additional name on succeeding to the Leigham Estate in South Devon. He was a liberal and considerate landlord, and the property has been thoroughly well managed during his ownership. He never lived at Leigham House, which is now let to Mr. Vere Cholmondeley.

Sir Frederic Johnstone has decided to sell the Westerhall estate in Dumfriesshire, which has been in the family since the early part of the thirteenth century. The property comprises over 23,000 acres. Westerhall House, near Langholme, was built about four hundred years ago. The Esk flows through the estate for several miles. Sir Frederic is one of the claimants for the Annandale peerage.

Didlington Hall, the seat of the late Lord Amherst of Hackney in West Norfolk, is to be sold shortly, along with the estate of 7,200 acres. The place once belonged to Lord Berners, and in ancient days it was owned by Earl de Warrenne. The Georgian house is large, handsome, and well arranged, and there are fine gardens and charming grounds. The park of 700 acres is flat but well wooded, and it contains a lake of sixty acres which is a noted resort of wild fowl. There is a large heronry. The famous lime avenue was planted in 1689. Didlington is one of the very best sporting estates in East Anglia, the shooting being quite first-rate. Many Royal personages have been guests at Didlington Hall during the last thirty years, including King Edward and the late King of Portugal. There is an avenue in the grounds near the house consisting of trees planted by Royal guests.

Florence Lady Nunburnholme is to entertain a party for pheasant shooting at Warter Priory, to meet the Grand Duke Michael Michailovitch and the Countess Torby. There is now some of the best cover shooting in England on the Warter estate. The Priory is in the East Riding, on the border of the Wolds, and it is well placed in a very pretty wooded valley. The house is in the French chateau style, and there are fine gardens. Extensive improvements of all kinds were carried out at Warter Priory by the late Lord Nunburnholme (then Mr. Charles Wilson) after he had purchased the estate from Lord Muncaster.

A morning paper stated last week that the Marquis of Dalhousie, who was Governor-General of India, left no son, but was succeeded in the earldom of Dalhousie and the Dalhousie-Panmure estates by his brother, the Right Hon. Fox Maule." This is a strange farrago of nonsense. Lord Dalhousie was succeeded by his cousin, Lord Panmure (the Fox Maule of the Crimean war, who was known to his political associates as "Mars"), who had himself inherited the great Panmure estates in Forfarshire from his father. The younger brother of the ninth Earl of Dalhousie assumed the name of Maule on succeeding (through his mother) to the estates of the extinct Earls of Panmure. The Maules were leaders of the Whig party in Forfarshire for nearly a century, and a hundred years ago Brechin Castle was a noted house for good living and hard drinking.

Mr. John Redmond has inspired many fine flights of imagination among his political adversaries, but Mr. F. E. Smith did a flight on Saturday which fairly holds the record up to the present. He beheld the Nationalist leader as "the uncrowned king of political mendicants, his pockets bulging with American gold, appearing from the sea like Aphrodite, but less lovely." From the little I have seen of Mr. Smith I expect that he would be less lovely if he appeared from the sea like Aphrodite. Few of us are seen at our best under such circumstances. But what puzzles me in Mr. Smith's vision is where the pockets, bulging or otherwise, are placed when a person appears like Aphrodite.

In a political experience extending over a good many years I have never seen a performance to equal the quick-change of front by the Unionist papers and orators in relation to the Irish Nationalists on the collapse of the Conference. A fortnight ago they were all revelling in the discovery that Mr. Redmond was a sane and honest patriot, a convinced Tariff Reformer, and an Imperialist to the backbone, pursuing a laudable policy, which it behoved the Unionist party to consider with cordial sympathy as a mere item in a blessed scheme of Imperial reorganisation. At a few hours' notice this unfortunate gentleman, although he had done nothing in the interval except land from a steamboat, and had not opened his mouth in public, relapsed into his previous unregenerate condition, and became once more a crafty traitor, commissioned by alien foes to wreck the British Constitution. On Friday, Saturday, and Sunday the American gold must have glittered in at least a dozen leading articles and speeches. If it had all been done by pressing a button at Westminster, the volte face could not have been more instantaneous and complete. I can't help thinking that this sort of thing must puzzle many an honest voter—possibly even to the extent of making him put his mark against the wrong name on his ballot paper.

The elections in the United States are of more interest than usual to us in this country. There is no doubt whatever that the Republican party has gone down before a general revolt against high tariffs and the consequent high prices of all commodities in general use. The Americans themselves are quite clear about this, and even the Tariff Reform journals in England, who would assuredly deny it if they could, accept the awkward fact.

Within the last few months the same story has come, with convincing force, from all the countries which our Tariff Reform prophets hold up to us as presenting the ideal conditions which we are to reach by abandoning free trade. In Germany the working classes strike and clamour for increased wages to meet the increased cost of living; and the middle classes join them in demanding the opening of the frontiers to the free importation of food. In France the recent railway strike, arising out of a demand for a special rate of pay for men who have to live in Paris, is only one of many demonstrations of the discontent resulting from the disastrous rise in prices. Now we have a similar movement in America, and again the middle classes are at one with the working classes in revolting against tariff-raised prices.

---

How can any rational being expect that England is going to be converted to Protection in the face of all this evidence? What sorry piffle Mr. Ellis Barker's "101 Points Against Free Trade" become in the face of the 102nd point—that prices do not rise where there are no tariffs! In the face of these national movements on the Continent and in America, what is the use of getting up on platforms and explaining to ordinary human beings that you have up your sleeve some scientific discovery which will prevent Customs tariffs having the effects in this country which are visible in all others? I don't doubt that a certain number of rabid Tariff Reformers honestly believe that they are in a position to work this miracle, but how a practical politician can expect to make anybody else believe it passes my comprehension.

---

The United States afford us an object lesson in more than the effect of tariffs on the price of household commodities. The story of the Payne Tariff is one of the most instructive instances of the difficulty always experienced in going back on a protectionist policy when it has once been adopted. The cry for tariff revision has been potent in United States politics for many years past. At the previous election the Republican party was committed to revision, and a Bill for that purpose was presented to Congress. But what was its fate? The arts of the lobbyist were set to work as only American boodlers know how to work them, with the result that before the Bill was passed the tariff had in many instances been revised upwards instead of downwards, and the last state of the public was worse than the first.

The foreigner does not pay the tax in America any more than in France and Germany, although he is so kindly going to do so in our case, when Mr. Bonar Law and his friends get the chance of constructing a tariff for us. Prices consequently have risen again under the Payne tariff. This breach of faith with the country was carried out in the teeth of a howl of execration from almost the whole press of the United States. But the vested interests had the whip hand, and cared nothing for the press or the public. A day of reckoning has now come at the polls, with disastrous results to the Republicans, but a good deal has to happen still before the American public shakes off the yoke of the tariff-established interests. A tariff, once in operation, rides a nation as the Old Man of the Sea rode Sindbad.

The strength of the feeling on this subject in America is shown by the fact that Mr. Roosevelt has gone down before it—at any rate for the time. It looks as if America was getting a little "fed up" with Theodore. This is hardly surprising. It is rather flying in the face of Providence for any man to stand a third time for the Presidency of the United States. When Washington declined a third term of office, although it was his for the asking, he established a tradition which has become a sort of informal article of the American Constitution. After his last retirement Mr. Roosevelt publicly accepted this tradition. But no sooner did he return from his foreign tour than he plunged again into politics. And when the Republican party showed a disposition to jib he scored a theatrical victory, and imposed his own candidate for the Governorship of New York on the party. All this has been understood to indicate his intention of imposing himself upon the Republicans as a candidate for the Presidency. The Republican defeat, and especially the defeat of his own candidate in New York, may possibly modify his views and those of his backers.

Mr. Barry O'Brien's "John Bright, A Monograph" (Smith, Elder and Co.) is full of most interesting reading, especially to those who have their own personal recollections of Bright. When I first entered Parliament in the sixties of the last century, Mr. Bright was very kind to me as a new member, while I regarded him as my political chief, and during the many years that I was intimate with him he never took exception to my occasional criticisms of his political action. I have been particularly interested in Mr. Barry O'Brien's references to Mr. Bright's relations with the Nationalists. Although he stoutly opposed Home Rule, Mr. Bright was most anxious to deal fairly with the issue on its merits.

The Irish were then given to violently attacking him, for they were angry that one on whom they had thought that they could count, and whose support was so powerful, should side against them. In some speech Mr. Sexton had suggested in reference to Mr. Bright that his intellect was failing. It was thought that it might be well if he were to apologise for this privately to Mr. Bright, for the observation had wounded him, and he frequently alluded to it in conversation. This Mr. Sexton was fully prepared to do. One day at the Reform Club I was sitting talking to Mr. Bright, when he said to me, "I hear that Sexton is going to call upon me and to apologise; have you heard anything of this?" I replied that I had, and that I thought that it showed that the Irish really appreciated his past services to Ireland. "You know Sexton," he said, "so be good enough to tell him that I do not want his apology. He was the man who said that my intellect was failing." I replied that it seemed to me that he was introducing personal feeling too much into a political difference, and that if a man made use in a speech of a hasty phrase which was unfair to a political opponent, he could not do more than apologise for it. He sat for a minute or two silent, then said, "Well, perhaps it is so, for a man never quite knows how he is influenced."

Lord Bute has purchased privately the Gaelic library which has been collected by the Rev. Donald MacLean, minister of Duirenech, in Skye, which is believed to be the finest and most complete collection of Celtic literature in the world. Mr. MacLean has all his life been collecting Celtic books and tracts, and he has managed to obtain a copy of every volume issued from a Gaelic press. He has been engaged for some years past on a Scoto-Celtic bibliography.

A musical library for the benefit of students is to be formed at Oxford, which is to contain the works of all the great masters. The first of the measures for University Reform, which are being brought forward at Oxford, came before Congregation last week, and the preamble of the new Statute relating to the reorganisation of the Faculties was passed by 155 to seventy-three. It is desired to entirely reconstitute the existing Faculties, and to establish a Central Board of supervision. The speeches on both sides were disappointing, but it was evident that considerable amendment will have to be made. Of course, it is only the first stage of the battle which has so far been won. The Warden of All Souls is not likely to continue his opposition if the amendments of which the Master of Balliol has given notice are passed.

This church was rebuilt in 1848 by John Keble (who was vicar of the parish for over forty years) out of the profits of the "Christian Year," and the stained-glass windows were a gift from the readers of that book. He was buried in the church in 1712, and there is a monument to his memory.

Considerable surprise has been excited among Yorkshire Churchmen by the announcement that the Bishop of Sheffield has resigned the important and valuable living of St. Mark's, Sheffield, in order that he may devote his whole time to episcopal work. It seems extraordinary that such an arrangement should have been made just when the Sheffield district is about to be formed into a separate see. The Archbishop of York is to pay a stipend of £850 a year to the Bishop Suffragan, who will also receive £300 a year from the Sheffield Bishopric Committee. The arrangement looks very much like an astute device to force the Prime Minister to appoint Bishop Quirk to the new see of Sheffield. One would like to know what the Archbishop supposes will become of Dr. Quirk when the new see is formed, as it is quite certain that the Bishop of Sheffield (whoever he may be) will not require the assistance of a suffragan. It is obvious that a clamour will be got up if Bishop Quirk is not appointed to the new see.

The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. J. M. Cairns, rector of Compton Martin, Somersetshire, to the vicarage of Kenilworth, which is of the net value of about £220 a year, with house, and vacant by the preferment of the late incumbent. Lord Loreburn has also presented the Rev. W. D. May, vicar of Orpington, Kent, to the rectory of Ampthill, Bedfordshire.

The trustees who are the patrons of the important living of St. Nathanael's, Cotham, Bristol, have presented the Rev. Ernest Walters, vicar of St. Peter's, Clifton Wood, to the benefice, which is vacant by the preferment of the late vicar. The appointment has met with general approval in the diocese, as Mr. Walters has done much excellent practical work in his present parish, which is a difficult and onerous one. He is a very clever organiser, and he is highly distinguished as a preacher. He has many times occupied the cathedral pulpit, and last year he preached the Dolphin Society sermon on Colston's Day.

Is it true that the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel declines to employ Eurasians, or the sons of Europeans born in India, as missionaries in that country? An admission to that effect, which was elicited from a speaker on behalf of the society, the Rev. J. A. Sharrock, at a recent meeting at Bangalore, is the subject of some pungent criticism in an Anglo-Indian journal. The society's policy is forcibly contrasted with St. Paul's method of propagating the gospel:—

> Many of the pastors he appointed were Eurasians, the sons of Jews and Europeans. Others were Jewish settlers who had lost touch with Palestine, and looked upon themselves as citizens of the land where they lived. Timothy was a Eurasian. We are told he was "a son of a certain woman who was a Jewess, but his father was a Greek." Had Timothy applied to the society represented by Mr. Sharrock he would have been told he could not be entertained. Something like the following would have been said to him: "We are very sorry, young man, we cannot employ you. You may be well-suited to the work, you may have the good of the Church at heart, but you are aware we cannot entertain Eurasians."

As a reason for the rejection of Eurasians, Mr. Sharrock said that some of those formerly ordained proved unworthy of their sacred calling. Very likely, but it is not altogether an unknown thing for English clerics and missionaries to go wrong, and it might just as logically be argued that Englishmen should therefore be excluded from the order of priesthood. My Anglo-Indian contemporary affirms that it is all a question of caste—and "there is more caste and of a worse kind among Europeans than among Hindus." Indian natives are ordained, but the missionary bodies "look upon them as standing upon a different platform from themselves, as of a different caste altogether." The Anglo-Indian or the Eurasian cleric would claim to be of the same caste as his European brethren, and hence the latter's objection to him. The society's attitude in the matter, if it has been correctly stated by the Rev. Mr. Sharrock, is a truly edifying example of modern missionary methods.

Some time ago I felt myself compelled to take exception to the management of the "Home for Gentlewomen" at Woodhall Spa, and I am glad to learn that drastic alterations have taken place, and the home is now thoroughly deserving of support. Colonel Bingham, who is retiring from the command of the 1st Life Guards, has been appointed commandant of the 2nd Cavalry Brigade at Canterbury, in the place of Colonel N. D. Captain Arthur Weld Forester, Grenadier Guards, and Major Hugh Joseph Fraser, Scots Guards, have left England for India, having been appointed aides-de-camp to the new Viceroy. Captain Forester is a son of Lord Forester, and Major Fraser is Lord Lovat's younger brother.

At Guildhall last week Sir John French belaboured Colonel Gädke very vigorously. Sir John need have no qualms. The British public will judge him not through German spectacles, but by their own instructed observation. Far from adopting Colonel Gädke's diatribes as gospel, Englishmen resent them as impertinence, with the result that many have gone to the opposite extreme of fulsome adulation. Of the two evils the latter is the worst.

Frank and competent criticism breathes a healthy atmosphere into military nostrils. People who can carry their memories back to the sixties will recall how the French Army went to pieces under the influence of senseless adulation, and how the Prussian military organisation was perfected by the strict examination to which it was subjected by the German public. The want of antecedent instructed press criticism of our Army was one reason why the Boer War went muddling along for two and a-half years instead of being ended in as many months. Soldiers, like politicians, must accept criticism as an aid to efficiency. Some hard words have been said, and will remain said, of the conduct of army manœuvres during the last two years, but no sting will remain where no cap fits.

Apropos of recent remarks in TRUTH on what is known as "the Babtie job," I would invite the attention of the Selection Committee to the following observations which I have received from a retired officer of the Royal Army Medical Corps:—

> With reference to the recent disgraceful jobbery in connection with the appointments in the higher grades of the Army Medical Service breaking the faith of a Royal Warrant, I venture to say that never in the annals of the Army Medical Service has such gross injustice ever before been perpetrated, and it is impossible to imagine how any honourable man or body of men could have acted as they did. Undue and outside influence of great weight must have been brought to bear. This points to the fact that the present system of selection should be altered.

A great deal has been said in TRUTH at one time and another of the grievances created by allowing men to remain in the Service after they have qualified for full pension, but I have just made the acquaintance for the first time of yet another grievance arising in this way. It is that the retention of "old stagers" in the Service deprives younger men of the opportunity of getting on the married roll. The point is raised by a man in the Royal Garrison Artillery, in which branch all the grievances of the Service seem now to be concentrated. It would seem that in the R.G.A., although N.C.O.'s are generally required to depart after they have completed their twenty-one years, a great many gunners are allowed to remain, with the result above mentioned, among others. This seems doubly wrong, for if anyone is to be allowed the privilege of remaining in the Service to the detriment of his juniors, the privilege should at least be reserved for the higher ranks.

My attention has been called by an Indian correspondent to the inadequate time allotted by commanding officers to preparing for examination for education certificates. All the severe work required for a first-class certificate has to be got through at night school during the hot season. As soldier students have to perform various duties—such as guards, picquets, company training, etc.—during their school course, the maximum number of hours which they can put in at school does not exceed thirty during the session. This only allows of a smattering of preparation, most of the candidates consequently making a very poor show on paper. If commanding officers were only in earnest about their men's education the number of first-class certificates in the Army would be greatly increased. Non-commissioned officers and men ought to be struck off duty for several months, when they could give their whole time to preparation for examination. Education tempered by discipline is the best equipment for practical soldiering, and in this matter both Germans and Japanese beat us out of the field.

---

I am credibly informed that it is very improbable that Prince Louis of Battenberg will accept the Devonport command. He has had a long unbroken spell of active employment of late years, and has intimated his willingness to remain unemployed until after the Coronation, leaving himself free to participate in the ceremonies.

---

My informant adds that another rumour which is meeting with general credence is that Sir Wilmot Fawkes will be relieved by Admiral Sir William May. This latter officer's term of command as admiralissimo of the Home Fleet will determine much about the time that the Devonport billet falls vacant. It is, of course, generally understood that Sir William May will be the next First Sea Lord, but Sir Arthur Wilson does not reach the age limit until March 4, 1912. Sir William May has done practically everything but act as a port admiral.

---

The Admiralty has already nominated a successor to Sir William May when he strikes his flag in March next.

As was generally expected, Admiral Sir Francis Bridgeman-Bridgeman, the present Second Sea Lord, will take over the command of the Home Fleet.

Several interesting changes in flag commands have been officially announced within the past few days. Rear-Admiral Peirse has been appointed to follow Rear-Admiral Sturdee in the Home Fleet, as predicted in TRUTH some little while ago. Rear-Admiral Farquhar, who has been Inspector of Naval Ordnance—and not to be confused with his namesake commanding the Fourth Cruiser Squadron—will take over the Devonport division of the Home Fleet from Rear-Admiral Arthur C. Galloway.

From the naval point of view, the most notable of the recent changes is the appointment of Vice-Admiral King-Hall to replace Vice-Admiral Sir Richard Poore in the Australian Command. Admiral King-Hall, who has been acting as Director of Naval Mobilisation, has had a very varied and distinguished career. He was for nine years an aide-de-camp to King Edward VII.

The principle of one-year commands for flag-officers in the Third and Fourth Divisions of the Home Fleet is developing disadvantages which render it probable that the Admiralty may discontinue the experiment. The idea of giving employment to as many flag-officers as possible is a sound doctrine in the main, but there must necessarily be limits. The result of these very frequent changes is that the officers concerned do not work up much enthusiasm for an association which they know to be so temporary; that considerable dislocation of routine and discipline is caused by the succession of admirals with different views; that there is a degree of permanent unrest amongst all ranks owing to the ever-present speculation as to what "the next man" will prove like. Sir Arthur Wilson, who is a staunch advocate of three-year commissions, regards with no favour a system which scarcely gives an admiral time to know all his officers, and discover the tactical merits of his fleet, before he is shifted.

When Rear-Admiral Robert Lowry shortly strikes his flag in the Second Cruiser Squadron he will go to the Admiralty for temporary service upon a committee which is being formed to inquire into pay and allowance. The terms of reference of this committee have not been made public, but I am told that the scope of the investigations will be very wide.

Captain H. J. O. Millar, the new Captain of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, is young for an appointment which is regarded as a very senior billet, being only forty-five years of age. He has been commanding the cruiser Juno since May, 1909. He relieves Captain Edward Mowbray at Greenwich on the 8th prox.

Captain M. S. Fitzmaurice, who goes to the Admiralty as Assistant-Director of Naval Intelligence in succession to Captain Thomas Jackson, acted as flag-lieutenant to Admiral Sir Frederick Bedford during the memorable commission of the Raleigh, when that officer was in command of the Cape of Good Hope Squadron.

Misgivings have been expressed as to the effect of the South Wales strikes on the coal supply of the Navy. This is not unreasonable, in view of the fact brought to light in TRUTH last year that the naval manœuvres were curtailed owing to the serious shortage of coal. The lesson learned on that occasion, however, seems to have been taken to heart, and the Admiralty are now in a position to view the trouble in the steam coalfields with equanimity. For weeks past colliers have been rushing in their cargoes to the home depots, and there is a reserve of more than a quarter of a million tons stacked at the dockyard ports. The labour dispute also comes at a season when the Fleet has finished its sea training for the year. It may be added that the latest warships are fitted with auxiliary oil-fuel installations for economic cruising purposes, and there is no shortage of supply in crude petroleum.

A good deal of adverse criticism has been occasioned by the choice of the Hermione to act as inspecting cruiser of airships, to which I made reference a few weeks since. The Admiralty seem to have overlooked one very important feature in a ship detailed for duties which must necessarily involve the occasional hoisting of an aeroplane bodily on board—namely, plenty of deck space. The Hermione is 320 ft. long and only 49 ft. 6 ins. between her bulwarks. There are seven of the Diadem class still left in the Service, which, when not engaged in relief trooping, do nothing at all. Surely one of these cruisers, with her 463 ft. of length and her 69 ft. of beam, would have been far better adapted to this work.

Complaints have reached me as to the hardship involved to young married naval officers by the abolition of second-class travelling on the Great Western and South-Eastern Railways. I have no doubt a great many civilians also regret the change, but these, at any rate, can travel third-class and find some sort of consolation in reflecting that they are saving money. Officers in uniform are prohibited from travelling third-class, and so they are obliged to meet the extra expense of first-class. At Chatham and at Devonport the Service residential districts lay a considerable distance away from the dockyards, so that married officers are necessarily compelled to do a good deal of railway travelling in uniform. The railway companies concerned might well make a concession which would minimise the increased expense.

The system under which lieutenants are permitted to take a signal course appears to need some revision. An officer who so qualifies is eligible for service as a flag-lieutenant. More than this, he expects to get a staff billet by virtue of his qualification, and disdains the idea of reverting to watch-keeping duties. The result is that the half-pay list is recruited by passed signal course lieutenants waiting until influence or luck brings them a summons from some admiral who is selecting his personal staff. A large proportion of these aiguilette-seekers, after kicking their heels in the daisy paths of dalliance as long as the unemployed regulations permit, lapse into a destroyer and discontent, or, worse still, requalify in signal course for a further spell of dalliance. The remedy, of course, is to limit the numbers permitted to undergo a signal course approximate to the list of flag-commands.

For some years past attempts have been made in India to reorganise the Countess of Dufferin's Fund with a view to better all round administration of the hospitals supported by the fund, but hitherto without much success. Perhaps this is hardly surprising in view of the fact that control of the fund is practically vested in a layman who, however useful in dealing with the financial part of the work, is hardly qualified to deal with its medical aspects. For so distinctively a woman's work as that undertaken by the Fund there seems every reason why women should have an active part in its control. As I have previously pointed out, in order that the objects of the fund should be attained, the appointment of fully qualified medical women to superintend the whole work is a sine quâ non. But if such a policy is to prove effective a woman doctor ought to be appointed as permanent secretary in place of the present holder of the office, whose recommendations for appointments necessarily cannot be based upon a practical knowledge of the work of the staff, and whose reports on the work of the fund reveal an ignorance of essential points connected with that work.

Seeing that the Government of India frequently issues circulars warning officers against dealing with native moneylenders, it is extraordinary that a firm at Lahore, who are well known in connection with that class of business, should have been allowed to advertise in the Indian Army List. Whether the advertisement appears in the current list I do not know, but an officer tells me that it is in the latest copy he has, and he adds that he can speak from personal experience of the exorbitant charges of the usurer in question. At home it is considered a disgraceful thing for a municipality or company to advertise a usury-shop on its tramcar tickets, and the Government of India can hardly claim to be judged by a lower standard.

For sheer stupidity the following exhibition of Post Office red-tape will be hard to beat. The mails between Inveraray and Lochgilphead were formerly conveyed by a horse-drawn vehicle, the scheduled time for the journey of twenty-four miles being three hours and twenty minutes. Some weeks ago the contractor put a motor-car on the route. By official orders, however, the driver adheres to the old time-table. He is instructed not to reach Lochgilphead Post Office until three hours and twenty minutes after he leaves Inveraray, and in consequence the car is every day drawn up outside the burgh boundary to exhaust the time allowance! I am sure the Postmaster-General will have something to say to the dunderheads responsible for this arrangement.

A curious custom was disclosed at the meeting of the Inverness Town Council which arranged for the annual luncheon of the councillors. In the past the new councillors have been called upon to pay for the liquor consumed. But at the recent election five stalwart teetotalers had been returned, and they declined to pay for anything stronger than coffee. This is the first time I have heard of town councillors being called upon to pay their footing on election. The protest against such a degrading custom would have been still stronger if made on general principles and not merely from the temperance standpoint.

In spite of official promises, nothing has been done to ameliorate the hard lot of the engrossing clerks in the Sasine Office, H.M. Register House, Edinburgh. These men, seventy-one in number, form what is ironically styled a permanent staff, but they are paid by piece-work, and their employment is so intermittent that the majority have been idle for about four months during the present year. Since the early part of August more than half the staff have been on the "idle list," yet in the two or more preceding months temporary assistance was engaged to cope with the work. No doubt the irregularity of the property market and the annual pressure at the Whit Sunday term make the case a difficult one to deal with; but it ought not to be altogether beyond the wit of the Keeper of the Sasine Office to arrange for at any rate a less uneven distribution of the work, and the Secretary for Scotland should insist upon this being done.

The waking up of Bumble in Ireland appears to be making progress. The Ballina Guardians are the latest to come under the official harrow, the Local Government Board having requested them to furnish an explanation of the dirty and neglected condition of the children in the nursery. The Guardians were astonished at the request, and determined to ask for an explanation from the matron of the workhouse. Whether the Ballina Bumbles were wilfully or ignorantly blind to the neglect which has been going on they are equally to blame.

The dirty condition of two children boarded out by the Campsie Parish Council was brought to the notice of these guardians of the poor by the visiting doctor at the school which they attended. One of them remarked that the doctor had a "right good cheek." It is lucky for boarded-out children that there are medical men with a right good cheek when Bumble fails in his duty to look after the welfare of the little ones in his charge.

In sanctioning bye-laws drafted by the Mutford and Lothingland District Council for governing the erection of wooden houses, the Local Government Board has taken a step of great interest to all concerned in the rural housing question. There is no reason why the wooden house should not be both sanitary and safe, and on the score of cheapness there can be no question that its erection will go a long way to remedy the dearth of cottage dwellings which exists in many rural districts to-day. The great defect of all the building by-laws is undoubtedly a lack of elasticity to meet local conditions. Wooden walls may be made as sanitary as brick, and shingles as weather-proof as tiles, but hitherto the refusal to permit new cottages to be built of such material has prevented their use in many places where the use of brick and tile makes the cost of erecting new dwellings prohibitive.

At the Holt County Court, Roberts and Co., of Eton Street, Richmond (No. 589b, TRUTH Cautionary List), recently sued a servant-girl, aged seventeen, for 6s. A female tout had called at the back door of the house where she was employed and offered a Bible for 50s., to be paid for by instalments. The girl declined to purchase. Then the mistress appeared on the scene, and the tout dumped the Bible down on the doorstep and made off. In due course the girl received a card from Roberts and Co. stating that 3s. was due. She at once sent the Bible back to the firm, of whose name she had until then been ignorant, and ultimately she was summoned at the County Court for two instalments. The plaintiffs did not appear, however, and judgment was given for the defendant, with costs on the highest scale, the judge saying that the case was worse than the ordinary imposition as they were profaning the Bible. I expect that Roberts and Co. will indulge in a little more profanity when they hear the judge's decision as to costs.

The sale of reputed old masters by means of the bogus execution trick described in TRUTH of August 17 seems to have been extensively practised in the North of England during the past three or four years, a correspondent telling me that similar sales have been brought under his notice at Scarborough, Whitby, Darlington, West Hartlepool, and Saltburn-by-Sea. My correspondent also sends me a catalogue of a sale held at Middlesbrough last Friday in which pictures purporting to be by such well-known painters as Dicksee, Leighton, Sydney Cooper, Vicat Cole, Birket Foster, Whistler, Constable, Morland, Turner, Fuseli, Maclise, Van Ostade, David Cox, and Herring are catalogued.

I do not know whether the revelations made in TRUTH have done anything to prevent sheriffs' officers being made mediums for victimising the public, but the above-mentioned sale was announced as "By order of the executors and to close estates." The beneficiaries under a will the executors of which sold Turners, Constables, and Whistlers at Middlesbrough would have very good cause for action against those who thus disposed of valuable property, and one would imagine that this fact alone would serve as a warning to purchasers. Apparently, however, the prospect of a bargain is too much even for the hard-headed men of the North. They forget that a picture wants something more than a name in a catalogue to make it valuable.

Why be an invalid? Why die prematurely? Why take medicine? Why use electric appliances? Why are you so behind the age? Such are the questions asked by "Dr." Hercules Sanche, of 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C., and Montreal, Canada. Of course, he is ready with an answer as to why you should do none of these things, and the answer is, buy an Oxydonor for £3 or £5. A marvellous instrument is the Oxydonor. It consists of a "vocor" and a contact disc. You fasten the disc to your ankle, put the vocor in a bucket of water, and it will cure you of any disease from which you may be suffering, from yellow fever to erisypelas, from a black eye to locomotor ataxy—according to "Dr." Sanche. Nor does the learned doctor leave you unenlightened as to the rationale of the treatment. The vocor "acquires an affinity for oxygen" from the bucket of water, and transmits the "affinity" to the wearer of the disc. This affinity causes the blood to drink in the oxygen in the air. Intense vitality begets heroic function, ending in "diaductive cure of disease regardless of form." It sounds like magic, but, alas! still more like quackery.

Like so many marvels, the Oxydonor comes from the U.S.A., and the Journal of the American Medical Association for October 22 gives a description of the instrument and of the career of its inventor. Sanche, it seems, is an exponent of what the Journal calls "gas-pipe therapy." He first put on the market an instrument called the Electropoise, which consisted of a piece of brass piping closed at each end and with a piece of flexible wire attached. It sold for 10 dollars. Then he set to work to perfect it, and produced the Oxydonor. In this case the brass pipe instead of being empty contains a stick of carbon such as electricians use, sealed at each end with sealing wax, and he sells it for 35 dollars. And this is the instrument which, being placed in a bucket of water, is supposed to produce the "diaductive force" which will cure all diseases! However, it had a success on the other side of the Atlantic, and rivals arose. One of them produced an Oxygenor. Sanche thereupon brought an action against the proprietors of the Oxygenor for infringement of his patent, the result being that the court held that such a palpable humbug as the Oxydonor was not entitled to legal protection.

In these legal proceedings one interesting point was the calling of reputable witnesses who declared that they had used one or the other of these devices and had been restored to health. But the court refused to accept their evidence as proving that this sequence of events was in the nature of cause and effect. The judge remarked that "It would be just as reasonable for an Iowa farmer to say his barn was not destroyed by the last thunderstorm because there was a lightning rod on Mount Pisgah as for a man to say that his restoration to health was brought about by the use of an Oxydonor or an Oxygenor." This is a neat appreciation of the value of the quack's testimonial.

John G. Dawson, "stable commissioner and Turf accountant," Wolverhampton (TRUTH Cautionary List, No. 289), formerly invited remittances for "investments" on which he guaranteed a minimum profit of 100 per cent. Apparently investors of the class to which he appealed have become scarce—at any rate, he is now merely a touting tipster, and "Plunge on Whisk Broom" was the advice he gave his deluded patrons for the Cambridgeshire. R. Doyle, 58, High Street, Brentford, is another of these gentry who style themselves "stable commissioners." He avers that he tipped Verney for the Cesarewitch, but I happen to have a circular of his in which his selection was The Nut. Turf

When a bookmaker calling himself a commission agent pleads the Gaming Act to avoid the payment of a betting account the fact deserves to be made known for the guidance of backers. This course was adopted in the Westminster County Court the other day by one Spencer Mitchell, who is said to have been formerly an Army tutor, but who has since carried on a betting business, first at 170, Piccadilly, and more recently at 30, Rathbone Place, under the name of Edward Hastings.

My last reference to Pizzey evoked a remonstrance from a gentleman with a surprisingly simple-minded faith in that Turf prophet. I wonder what he thinks of the prophet's latest performance? "I am more than ordinarily sanguine," Pizzey wrote on November 7, "that Sunspot will win the Liverpool Cup, and if you fail to win a winter's keep by his success don't blame me, for I shall have nothing better to bring to your notice this season." Sunspot started at 3 to 1 and finished eighth. And Pizzey himself says that he will have nothing better than that this season!

As a joint stock company N. Stafford, Limited, may be without a soul to be saved or a body to be kicked, but that it nevertheless possesses a heart palpitating with sympathy for all of us is clear from a circular now being distributed from 55, Cross Street, Manchester. "Knowing the need of the people," it begins, "we venture to place ourselves in communication with you in strictest confidence." A temporary cash advance is what you are presumed to need, and the strictly confidential circular is sent to prevent you from applying to moneylenders "who advertise in the press full of misleading statements, well knowing it is impossible for them to accomplish what they preach, and it only causes offence and hardship to the applicant." It is persuasively added:—"Our aim is to assist the people, and not to oppress or harass them in any way." How this philanthropic mission is carried out was shown by a case I once cited. Nathan Shaffer (alias "N. Stafford") nobly assisted a borrower with a loan at only a few hundreds per cent. interest, and a judge inconsiderately treated it as a harsh and unconscionable bargain.

I have been hearing a little more about "Lieutenant-Commander" E. Moffat Soames and his "National Naval Cadets," who were begging for subscriptions in the streets the other day. For one thing I learn that the enterprise is really an offshoot of the Howard Street Gospel Mission, of which Soames is the missionary, and for another that the movement has for its "Commander-in-Chief" a Greenwich lighterman named Hardwick. A considerable number of boys belong to it, and there is a committee at one of whose recent meetings a proposal was put forward to pay the Commander-in-Chief and the Lieutenant-Commander salaries of £400 a year each. The "National Naval Cadets" are in no way connected with the Boys' Naval Brigade, which is now affiliated with the training ship Mercury. The Brigade has recently been engaged in affiliating all the various boys' naval training schemes and organising them on one plan, and in pursuance of this operation inquiry has been made into Soames' enterprise. As the result the "National Naval Cadets" have not been admitted to affiliation with the Boys' Naval Brigade, and that fact alone should be sufficient to warn the public against subscribing to the corps.

Of all the undeserving beggars who have quartered themselves on the public there are few who equal in persistence and audacity the Henville family. They removed a few months ago from Basingstoke to "Hughendon," Abbey Road, Eynsham, Wilts, whence the same old begging letters are despatched in Mrs. Henville's name. It is doubtful, however, whether Mrs. Henville herself writes many of them, for she must be nearly eighty years of age, and in all probability some of the worthless daughters who reside with her are engaged in keeping up the family tradition. What money they receive is usually expended in drink, and a few weeks ago their present abode was searched for some whisky which a young lad living there admitted he had stolen, stating that his aunts and grandmother had consumed it.

"It is my intense desire to devote my life to the enlightening of my generation as to physical culture," writes Miss Maud Denning from The Grange, Wellesley Park, Wellington, Somerset, to a total stranger, and she encloses a number of trumpery trinkets, which she suggests the person to whom she writes shall sell in order to provide funds for the necessary training to enable her to achieve her ambition. I hope that Miss Maud has not been disposing of many trinkets by this method; but it looks to me as if she had neglected moral culture in her devotion to physical.

A word of warning to the inhabitants of Southampton and district may not be out of place in regard to the operations of a reputed artist named Stanley Wright. He canvasses for orders for enlargements of photographs in pastel or water-colour, and endeavours to obtain money in advance to pay for materials. These orders he is not always able to execute, because he omits to pay the photographer to whom he has given the orders for the enlargements. With all such persons payment on delivery is the only safe rule.

A fortnight ago I related the story of the swindling of a lady by an applicant for a servant's place. Although I did not mention any name, the particulars given were sufficient for a Berkshire magistrate to identify the operator as a woman named Lester, who had made a similar attempt to obtain travelling expenses from his wife. Whether Lester is her real name is doubtful, for she has been convicted under the name of Gordon, and swindlers of that type are bound to change their names frequently. In any case ladies who advertise for cooks will do well not to pay the travelling expenses of applicants for situations until they have verified the references given, no matter how plausible a story is told them.

Nearly two years have elapsed since I have heard anything of "Eleanora Gordon Cumming," otherwise Mrs. Nakeska, but I find that she is still actively engaged at 18, Dundonald Street, Edinburgh, in the works which secured for her a niche in Truth Cautionary List. I wonder how many head of philanthropic game during this period have been bagged by the astute "daughter of the Lion-Hunter."

One or two correspondents have sent me circulars from Ernest A. Watts, 1, Barter Street, W.C., in reference to the missing word, hidden letter, and similar competitions carried on by Bots Weekly, of Middelburg. Watts gives this sheet and its "editor," George Arrowsmith, a fulsome puff, but repudiates any connection with them. His object, it seems, is to supply "guaranteed exclusive solutions" for these competitions, and as his remuneration he will accept a small percentage of the winnings, to be fixed by the winners. To demonstrate his ability Watts has favoured each of my correspondents with the same "exclusive solution" for a £500 competition, telling them that he "feels confident" it contains the winning words, and pointing out that it only requires the transmission of an entrance fee of 3s. 6d. to Arrowsmith. This is a remarkable business. If Watts can find the winning solutions, why in the name of wonder does he not pay the entrance fee and take the £500 prize himself, instead of giving it away to strangers in return for a small percentage?

I came across a novel sort of business the other day through the medium of a soldier serving in India who had advertised in a London newspaper for a missing relative. In response to his advertisement he received a circular inviting him to register himself at the Universal Address Registry at Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, Strand, at a cost of 3s., and he sent the circular on to me to know whether the Registry was genuine. It is genuine enough in so far as it really exists, but precisely what good purpose it is likely to serve seems doubtful. The idea in the minds of the promoters seems to be to provide people who have lost touch with their friends and relatives with a means of getting into communication with them. But it seems to me that the people who are careless enough to leave their relations in ignorance of their names and addresses are just the people who will not only fail to pay 3s. to the registry, but neglect to keep the registry posted in their future wanderings.

A South African correspondent sends me particulars of a unique offer he has received from the Carter Service Bureau, of School Lane, Formby, Liverpool. He is to get three friends to fill up forms containing particulars for insertion in the "Carter Mailing Directory" and return them to the Bureau, when he will be presented, as a free gift, with a book on marriage. The friends are to pay 6d. each, and in return they are promised a "big mail"—lots of specimen magazines, catalogues, money-making propositions, agencies, food samples—by every post, free. The directory is to be sent not only to those whose names appear in it, but to thousands of firms who are looking for such lists. I know those firms. They are mostly in the mail order line of business, and I can quite understand that they are looking for simple-minded people who can be induced to pay 6d. for the insertion of their names in a directory of "mugs."

Mr. Ashley Larkins is still busily engaged advertising for employees in one capacity or another, and offering a good salary and free residence to persons of real ability. The other day he offered a theatrical managership to a Russian Prince temporarily in exile, although this gentleman declared himself to be quite unacquainted with the theatre in this country. When in course of negotiations the Prince found that Larkins wanted him to pay 5s. 6d. for an agreement he began to have his suspicions, for it seemed incomprehensible that a gentleman who was about to pay him a considerable salary and give him carte blanche in arranging a new theatrical enterprise should want in the first place to receive so trivial a sum. So the Prince in the course of his inquiries found his way to Truth office, with the consequence that he has saved his 5s. 6d., and, much more important, saved the association of his name with that of Larkins.

As an industrious founder of societies Mr. Eustace Smith, whose latest address is Central House, 12, Aldgate, London, E.C., would be hard to beat. Since the last reference to him in Truth in last July he has already managed to place two more promotions to his credit. England having failed to wake up at the bidding of the Wake Up England League, the League has now given place to the Goodwill Society, the main object of which I take it is to hold out the olive branch to possible subscribers. Another of Eustace's little ventures is the British Industries and Arts Association, which was intended to supply the best professional, expert, and special assistance in the daily affairs of life at the moderate price of 10s. 6d. per annum, such as telling you where to live or filling up Form IV. for you. There seems to have been no particular demand for Mr. Eustace Smith's advice on these knotty points, and the Association has already gone the way of the League and its forerunner, the Peace Promoting Society.

The reference in Truth on October 26 to Mr. Richard Brandon and his variety agency at 15, Challoner Mansions has resulted in my having an interview, by deputy, with Mr. Brandon and a friend of his who is a music hall agent doing business chiefly with halls in the provinces. The interview, I am glad to say, was of a cordial nature. Mr. Brandon was frankness itself. So was his friend. But its effect has been in no way to alter my opinion that aspirants to dramatic fame will not find a short cut viâ Challoner Mansions. For instance, Mr. Brandon said that about twenty pupils had already passed through his hands this year, and of these two had been successful in securing engagements, one of them being booked three times.

The experience of one of the eighteen unsuccessful pupils has already been related in Truth. My representative put to Mr. Brandon the case of another. This was a young lady who had paid Mr. Brandon £36 in all. For this she had received five songs and six months' tuition. She had a trial at a hall in the East of London. It was a "frost." Mr. Brandon seemed to think that this was no reflection upon either his songs or his tuition. He argued, and his agent friend argued also, that stage-fright was responsible for her failure. Indeed, they asserted emphatically that it is "the limelight that kills," and no tutor can provide against its death-dealing qualities. There is no doubt an element of truth in the argument, but it is not sufficient to explain why only two out of twenty accepted pupils should manage to get some sort of an engagement.

The fact of the matter is that aspirants to stage honours are usually so firmly impressed with belief in their powers that the tutor who will minister to their vanity finds them easy victims. I should not, however, place Mr. Brandon amongst those who deliberately lay themselves out to victimise the stage-struck. He has a naïve belief in his own capacity as author, composer, and tutor which disarms the idea. Besides, he frankly agreed that it was possible that he might have been too optimistic in regard to what he could do for the ladies and gentlemen who came to him with a view to going on the stage. For the future, he declared, he would be more guarded in the expression of his opinions about ultimate results. I think we had better leave it there.

CLIMATE AND CHARACTER.

(By a Southward Bound Traveller.

Adieu, adieu! My native land
Fades o'er the waters blue (Which is a euphemism for
A sort of Irish stew).
Of fog and sleet I've had enough,
Of gales and frosts that bite;
So, though I'm reckoned fairly tough,
My native land, Good-night!

Adieu, adieu! My native shore
Has seen the last of me,
For its erratic weather ne-
Ver yet agreed with me.
I like my seasons in their place,
Not mixed, as though in spite;
So, cradle of the English race,
My native land, Good-night!

Adieu, adieu! Land of my birth,
'Tis said we English owe
Our characters' main features to
Your rain and fog and snow.
Though this be true, I'm still inclined
To speed me on my flight;
I'll leave my character behind,
My native land, Good-night!

SCRUTATOR.

THE FAT IN THE FIRE.

THE failure of the Constitutional Conference is regretted by everybody except the violent partisans on each political side. The result is the more deplorable because there is every reason to suppose that it might easily have been avoided. When the Conference was first constituted, it was pointed out in these columns, by one of the oldest now living of old Parliamentary hands, that to ensure the success of a negotiation of this kind it is highly desirable to find an "honest broker" who can act as a mediator between the two parties. Anybody can see the force of this. When two parties are involved in a long-standing and acrimonious dispute, however desirous they may be of adjusting their difference, it is of little use for them to meet and talk matters over without the presence of a third party, in whose impartial judgment both have confidence, who can smooth over difficulties, suggest practicable compromises, and gently bend stiff backs by the weight of his influence. We see this constantly in the case of international conflicts and in all sorts of disputes among private individuals. The mediator is especially necessary where the principals in the negotiation are not only disputants themselves, but at the same time the delegates of a large body of clients whom they cannot afford to displease. In this particular instance the difficulty of bringing mere delegates to an agreement without a mediator was intensified by the fact that the delegates had no mandate or authority from their clients to negotiate at all. This condition must necessarily narrow very considerably the limits of possible concession or compromise. It is almost incomprehensible how the teaching of all experience in similar cases came to be overlooked when the late Conference was initiated. It would not have been difficult to find a chairman or "moderator" fully qualified for the post. From the fact that the eight statesmen have thought it worth while to continue their labours for many months, it must be inferred that they found a certain number of points on which they could agree, and that they remained for a long time in the hope that some sort of agreement could eventually be arrived at. In such a case, with an honest desire on both sides for a settlement, it is almost impossible to doubt that, if the good offices of an influential mediator had been available, the outstanding matters of difference could have been adjusted. The thing is done almost every day in disputes quite as momentous as this one to those immediately concerned in them.

It is no use crying over spilt milk, but, at any rate, those of us who lament the catastrophe are entitled to speak our minds about those whose clumsiness has brought it about. Attempts are now being made on each side to throw the blame for the failure upon the other. This is the sort of side issue on which a great deal of vituperative energy is certain to be expended at a general election; and we may expect to hear before long precise statements as to the proceedings of this side or that in the Conference which finally upset the apple-cart. But the truth is that a failure under these circumstances reflects on the whole eight collectively, without distinction of persons or parties. It is the fault of the whole eight that they did not foresee at the outset of their proceedings the need of the assistance of a diplomatic mediator and obtain such assistance. Their neglect of this precaution is not the only matter in which they are to blame. If they were unable to arrive at any agreement among themselves on the matter immediately at issue, it could not have been impossible for them to agree on some means of adjusting the points on which they found their views irreconcilable. They ought to have recognised their own disqualifications for the purpose which they had in view, and to have suggested a method by which it might have been accomplished. They have not been without timely hints in this direction; in fact, on the assumption that their labours would result in some definite proposal of this kind, a vast amount of ink has lately been expended in discussing the possibilities of a larger and more authoritative conference, and in preparing the minds of pugnacious politicians for the reception of such a scheme. There is no doubt that a great number of reasonable men on both political sides dislike the idea of submitting a complicated question of constitutional reform to the rough and ready arbitrament of a general election; and they have special cause for disliking it at the present time, when, owing to the multiplicity of burning questions in which different sections of the community are interested, it is practically impossible for any single issue to be put before the electors on its own merits exclusively. There is the further consideration that the electoral omens do not promise any very decisive variation between the results of a fresh election at the present date and those arrived at in January last, in which case a dissolution will do nothing to solve the difficulties of the present Parliamentary situation. It is no credit to eight of our leading politicians that in such circumstances they could do nothing to put the question before them in the way of being settled by somebody else, even if they were not able to settle it themselves.

So far as can be judged at the moment of writing, all the fat is now going again into the fire. Apparently the Government have decided upon a dissolution of Parliament forthwith. If that is so, the motives that have influenced them must be purely "tactical," and as a mere matter of tactics there is a good deal to be said for the decision. At the moment things look uncomfortable for the Opposition. Their general staff does not seem to be quite ready for battle. The ranks are all at sixes and sevens. The House of Lords question must be the biggest bone of contention at an election, and there is hardly a Unionist M.P. who will venture to defend in public the present constitution of the Upper House; yet the party offers no alternative policy to that of the Government. You cannot logically justify the present Veto if you admit that the constitution of the House ought to be reformed. In regard to Home Rule, which has so long been an electioneering stand-by in the hour of need, a large section has openly abandoned the orthodox Unionist doctrine, and the traditional vituperation of the Nationalists has begun to fall very flat. The agitation against the 1909 Budget, which yielded useful material at the last election, has altogether fizzled out; the Rump of the Anti-Budget League—Mr. Pretyman and his Land Union—are so desperately unpopular in urban constituencies that they actually had to be warned off the ground by their own side at the Walthamstow election. Tariff Reform has been hit between wind and water by the undeniable revolt against food taxes and high prices in all the great protectionist countries; and even Tariff Reformers admit that they can make no headway in a time of booming trade like the present. It is no help to the party that at such a time numbers of its M.P.'s and candidates have identified themselves with an irresponsible movement in favour of compulsory military service, which is likely to prove as unpopular with the democracy as food taxes. All this is obvious enough, and justifies a Liberal in taking a hopeful view of the situation. But other things equally certain are that the constituencies often behave in quite an unexpected way at general elections; that when a Government has been five years in office the normal disposition of the electors is to turn it out; and that a party which has looked like a chaotic mob in opposition has sometimes been sent back to Westminster after a dissolution with a compact working majority. Another fact likely to weigh against the Government in many quarters is that nobody wants a general election just now, except the people who will make money out of it. To most of us a general election is at the best a disagreeable necessity; and in this case a great many people will hold that there is no necessity at all for it at present, and will resent being put to inconvenience and financial loss merely because the Government sees a chance of getting an advantage out of an immediate dissolution. In short, the Government will be making an experiment which can only be justified by the result. In the meantime all one can say is that in politics, as in war, the bold course is generally the wisest.

THEATRE v. MUSIC HALL.

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's latest manifesto, delivered on the eve of his departure for America, is an urgent request to the Home Secretary to bring in a short bill giving one simple licence to both music halls and theatres, enabling either to produce whatever form of entertainment they please. I quite agree with Mr. Jones that it is wholly ridiculous that there should be thirteen different sorts and kinds of licences for places of entertainment, and I have again and again in these columns urged that it should be as free for music halls to produce plays as for theatres to give star turns. It is customary to say that this would be hard on theatrical managers, who are already suffering under music hall competition, but the whole question resolves itself into giving the public an entertainment that they want. Anything more ridiculous than the present regulation, which says that a one-act play at a variety theatre may only have six speaking parts it would be difficult to imagine, and I wish that some prominent manager would produce a play lasting over the stipulated time, namely thirty minutes, and containing more than the legal number of speaking characters, since a prosecution might do more than anything to demonstrate the absurdity of the situation. It is, of course, a bad thing to advocate the breaking of laws, but this is sometimes the only way in which imbecile laws can be shown up and their alteration forced.

In spite, however, of this very legitimate grievance under which the music halls suffer, why is it that they flourish so much more, in the provinces especially, than the homes of the legitimate drama? Mr. Jones touches on the subject, but does not go far enough into it, and I have been exceedingly interested in Mr. Laurence Irving's long contribution to the question in the Daily Mail. It is really no question of Censorship or licensing, and Mr. Irving sees this very clearly, though he has suffered under the Censorship because one of his desires is to produce that brilliant but banned play, "Les Trois Filles de M. Dupont." The reason why music halls flourish in the provinces while the homes of the drama are half empty is that actors and managers have become too "snobbish." They have despised the lowlier forms of entertainment—Mr. Irving very rightly calls attention to the mixed bills which used to prevail in his father's early days, the days when "Hamlet" stood "cheek by jowl with 'Boots at the Swan'"—and they have staged plays in which inaudibility "has been enthroned as naturalness, debate as drama, inanition as the acme of truth." I have just been away in the provinces, and I can endorse all that Mr. Irving says. Each individual performer at the halls has to be capable of standing alone and holding the house under penalty of being yelled at to "get off." He must make good, as our American friends say, or he is useless. A one-act play or sketch (and no one yet has been able to tell me the difference) must be dramatic or humorous, must hold the house from the rise of the curtain to the fall, or it is condemned at once. In London, anything does for a curtain-raiser at a theatre, but see what a music-hall audience would say to one of these plays if you offered it to them and called it a sketch! Anybody can write a one-act play, but very very few people can write sketches which are of any use, and the few who can reap a rich harvest. In recent years quite a number of our best-known actors and actresses have gone on the halls, but very few have learnt anything from their experiences. Mr. Laurence Irving, though, I can see very clearly, has learned a great deal, and he has come back with a respect for the halls, not with a contempt for them. Music-hall audiences are intensely loyal, but they will not be bored, and they will have good talent, by which I mean first-rate talent; and whereas for years and years the most mediocre reproductions of London successes have been deemed good enough for the provincial theatres, the big music-hall managers have sent on circuit their star turns. The music hall is alive in the provinces solely through energetic management. The theatre is moribund through mismanagement. You have only to go into the principal theatre and the principal music hall in any provincial town and you feel the difference at once between stagnation and enterprise. The whole atmosphere is different.

Mr. Irving again puts his finger on the right place when he urges that the way to change all this is to inaugurate stock companies. The present resident manager system, which means that each theatre is more or less in charge of a man who is only concerned with booking companies on the most favourable terms, is disastrous. What Miss Horniman has done in Manchester and Mr. Wareing at Glasgow could be done all over the country if only a few of our young and clever actors and actresses would throw themselves into the movement. But, and I think this is where Mr. Jones' argument would come in, no fetters should be imposed on them. They should be free to produce tragedy, farce, musical comedy, or interleave one-act plays with variety turns. The one thing essential is for them to make their ventures alive and personal, so that each town could take a personal pride in its theatre and company. Would any theatre in London succeed if its personnel were continually changing? I doubt it very much. Imagine the St. James with a new Alexander every week, the Criterion with a new Wyndham, or Daly's with a new Dollar Princess! The present moving procession of plays does not attract the best people in the provinces, and it does not even attract the fourpenny gallery. There is an enormous chance for some one to take our provincial theatres in hand, and when this is done we shall hear less about the growing domination of the music hall. All questions of licensing and censorship, however irritating, are merely side-issues. The great fact is that the variety theatres are alive, and that the legitimate theatres potter along their old course complaining that their audiences are leaving them, and trying to prevent the halls giving the public what they will not give them themselves. They are suffering now badly, and they will suffer more in the near future. Is it not time that they looked into the real reasons for their loss of popularity?

THE GLASS OF FASHION.

There was once a pot who, in an evil moment for itself, called the kettle black. There was once an ill-advised being who, having for some reason taken up residence in a glass house, threw stones. There was once a physician who cured others and was ill himself. And so forth and so on. There have been and there are and there will be any number of men and women who have raved at women for the extravagance and eccentricity and exaggeration of their clothes. These men and women are the pot, the glass-house dweller, and the sick physician. There is likewise the man with a beam in his eye who reproached his brother with the mote in his. Enough of proverbial lore. Let any one look through Mrs. Ashdown's History of British Costume during Nineteen Centuries and say whether either men or women may reproach each other for the wildness of their clothes. The absurdity of the sugar-loaf hat of Edward IV's reign was the direct begetter of the steeple head-dress of the women. The man's chaperons were as numerous and as idiotic in their forms as any enormous hat of to-day, and, oh! how is it that pointed shoes have been considered a vanity of women when gentlemen of Edward IV.'s reign wore footgear more like a Venetian gondola than anything else? Let us read Mrs. Ashdown's book and call a truce to mutual recrimination—or, rather, concentrate our scorn upon the fact that the first thing Adam and Eve thought of when they had eaten the apple was a new dress.

Fig leaves sewn together were, it must be remembered, in Eden more startling than any split Directoire gown to-day. To begin with, it was as unnatural then to wish to hide the body as at this time it is indecent to uncover it. We have become so used to clothes that we do not realise what odd unnatural things they are. Left to himself, without the intrusion of moral (or immoral) tendencies, man would probably have contented himself with an animal's skin for cold weather; but having once begun with an apron of fig leaves, he set to work to make his clothes express his rank, his character, and, in a good many periods, his political opinions, his religion, and his native country. As Carlyle has pointed out, clothes are the readiest symbol of one man's difference from another, and were some extraordinary act of God to strip us all, kings and princes, while retaining a good many differences from beggars and working-men (for their well-kempt hair and clean skins would remain) would be merged in that enormous number of other men who keep clean. Cleanliness then would be the only class distinction so far as appearance went.

It is a proof of the fact that ideas are stronger in men's minds than they used to be that King George can wear a bowler hat and a loud suit without being dethroned; he would only embarrass us were he to appear in the regal garments of the kings of an earlier age. And what in the name of wonder should we think of him if he wore a waistcoat formed of an embroidered Royal standard? Yet such things were once as natural as a Norfolk jacket. Looking through the many illustrations of Mrs. Ashdown's book, one cannot help seeing that clothes have fulfilled a very important part in expressing a nation's mental attitude. That nowadays they have ceased to be expressive is due probably to the rise of commerce and the necessity caused by an increasing population for every ninety-nine men out of a hundred to work for their living. In these conditions clothes have naturally sunk to the position of a neutral necessity, and little now differentiates the millionaire from the bank clerk. The former's clothes are better, but they are essentially of the same pattern as the latter's.

It is also natural that in women, in whose hands rests the responsibility of carrying on the social machinery of the country, these class distinctions should be more obviously shown. The blouse and skirt of Hammersmith differs in feeling almost as much as in value and workmanship from the latest production of Dover Street. It is doubtful if, as women become more and more a working class, this difference will last in the same degree. It took all the time from Elizabeth down to the mid-Victorian era for men to decline from the doublet and hose, the jewelled stomacher and the exaggerated ruff to the homespun of to-day. The same economic and social influences have only recently got to work on women. In three hundred years their garments may be as uniform, but, let us pray, not so ugly, as the average male attire of to-day. In oriental countries men have retained the instinct of dress, and they may yet recapture in the occident the main essentials of beauty, while economic conditions are almost certain, in the course of time, to shear away the extravagances of women's dress.

There is, perhaps, no London sight which in a small way is so pathetic as that of the little work-girl or the office typist, arrayed in a cheap and dreadful travesty of fashions which at the best are idiotic and meaningless. The string of pearl beads (4¾d. at the draper's), the awful sequin embroidery, the hat which looks like some demented bird; perhaps, more than all, the courageous attempt to achieve the latest bird's-nest coiffure—these things which one laughs at kindly or unkindly, according to mood, are after all strivings after what seems to their wearer the beautiful, and this will continue so long as there remains any vestige of the idea that women as a whole are a class of butterflies whose supreme duty is to procure fine colours for their wings. One sees these poor little clutches at the flying tresses of Fashion chiefly among the uncultured class of women workers, while in the great middle class of England they are to be found in a slightly better form among the idle daughters of the fairly well-to-do. The working daughters, as a whole, dress suitably, durably, and with a charming sense of the way in which these clothes can be combined with beauty. Nobody wants a girl to look dowdy simply because she works; on the other hand, a hobble skirt is (thank Heaven!) an impossibility to any one who has to swing on and off 'buses at full speed.

This change going on under our eyes is indicative of the way in which history mirrors itself in the dress of a nation. In studying the costumes of previous periods one can trace a number of similar changes by the alteration in the dress of men and women, and it follows that even the dominant emotions of a period have their effect on costume. Georgian artificiality, coquetry, and stateliness express themselves in powder, patches, and the stiffest of brocades; early Victorian sensibility slopes its shoulders and flows into ruffles. The same principle underlies the story of dress in every country and every age. The philosophy of clothes is deep and profound; in their effect they carry indications of their cause, and it would be interesting to feel sure that from some other sphere we should be able to watch our descendants adapting their dress to their lives almost as instinctively as animals change their skins in accordance with their environment.

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

IV.—THE LAWLESSNESS OF THE RING.

THE Standard Oil Trust has been repeatedly and publicly charged in America with using in the pursuit of its ends or the defence of its interests such weapons as perjury, bribery, open violence, and arson. It will be the purpose of the present article to show a few of the grounds on which these charges rest. They concern, of course, individual members of the combination rather than the whole combination, but collectively they afford most edifying evidence of the spirit by which the operations of the Trust have been directed in its native land. We will begin with that part of the case which concerns Mr. J. D. Rockefeller personally.

Hard Swearing.

In 1888 the mystery surrounding the ramifications of the Standard ring caused the Senate of New York State to order an "Investigation Relative to Trusts," and before the Commission entrusted with this investigation Mr. Rockefeller appeared and was questioned as to the initium malorum—the South Improvement Company. I quote from the official report of this investigation:—

Q. There was such a company?
A. I have heard of such a company.
Q. Were you not in it?
A. I was not.

As pointed out in my former articles, Mr. J. D. Rockefeller was a director with 180 shares in the concern, and the fact is now absolutely beyond dispute. The statement above was made on February 28, and on April 30 following Mr. Rockefeller appeared before a Committee of the House of Representatives at Washington, and the following colloquy took place:—

Q. I want the names particularly of gentlemen who either now or in the past have been interested with you gentlemen who were in the South Improvement Company?

A. I think they were O. T. Waring, W. P. Logan, John Logan, W. G. Warden, O. H. Payne, H. M. Flagler, William Rockefeller, J. A. Bostwick, and—myself.

A direct contradiction of his own words within the space of two months! Again, questioned as to railway rates by the New York Senate Committee, Mr. Rockefeller was asked if there had been any arrangements by which the trust or the companies controlled by it got transportation at any cheaper rates than were allowed to the general public, and his answer was:—

No, we have had no better rates than our neighbours. But, if I may be allowed, we have found repeated instances where other parties had secured lower rates than we had.

The Committee, however, was not satisfied, and returned to the charge later on in the day, and Mr. Rockefeller, after much wriggling and evasion, practically admitted the contrary:—

Q. Has not some company or companies embraced within this trust enjoyed from railroads more favourable freight rates than those rates accorded to refineries not in the trust?

A. I do not recall anything of that kind.

Q. You have heard of such things?

A. I have heard much in the papers about it.

Q. Was there not such an allegation as that in the litigation or controversy recently disposed of by the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Rice's suit; was not there a charge in Mr. Rice's petition that companies embraced within your trust enjoyed from railroad companies more favourable freight rates?

A. I think Mr. Rice made such a claim. Yes, sir.

Q. Did not the Commission find the claim true?

A. I think the return of the Commission is a matter of record. I could not give it.

Q. You don't know it; you haven't seen that they did so find?

A. It is a matter of record.

Q. Haven't you read that the Interstate Commerce Commission did find that charge to be true?

A. No, sir; I don't think I could say that. I read that they made a decision, but I am really unable to say what that decision was.

Q. You did not feel interested enough in the litigation to see what the decision was?

"SANITAS" is the Brand or Hall Mark of value for Disinfectants of all kinds, for use in the House, Stables, Kennels, &c. Pamphlet free. The Sanitas Co., Ltd., Limehouse, London, E.

A. I felt an interest in the litigation I don't mean to say I did not feel an interest in it.

Q. Do you mean to say that you don't know what the decision was?

A. I don't say that. I know that the Interstate Commerce Commission had made a decision. The decision is quite a comprehensive one, but it is questionable whether it could be said that that decision in all its features results as I understand you to claim.

Q. You don't so understand it? Will you say, as a matter of fact, that it is not so?

A. I stated in my testimony this morning that I had known of instances where companies altogether outside of the trust had enjoyed more favourable freights than companies in this trust, and I am not able to state that there may not have been arrangements for freight on the part of companies within this trust as favourable as, or more favourable than, other freight arrangements; but, in reply to that, nothing peculiar in respect to the companies in this association. I suppose they make the best freight arrangements they can.

After these exhibitions of prevarication and shuffling on the part of a distinguished witness on his oath before a State tribunal it is peculiarly edifying to come across the following paragraph among a mass of financial information in the Wall Street Journal of October 23 last:—

ONE MILLION FOR MORAL HEALTH.

Almost coincident with the announcement of the new benefactions to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research comes from Washington the statement that $1,000,000 has been or is about to be raised wherewith to establish institutions for the moral health of the world. Of this $1,000,000 Mr. Rockefeller has pledged himself to give a little over $500,000. The rest of the money is to be or has been pledged by men of wealth, and the money is to be expended along the line of the great laymen's missionary organisation, being undenominational, and for the increase of facilities for Young Men's Christian Association work in both hemispheres

Valuable as this benefaction is, nevertheless the work which is to be done in the Institute of Medical Research will undoubtedly be regarded if not more important, at least fully as important, for it is the modern philosophy that in order to attain moral health there must be in the first place physical health.

This is a typical example of the way in which the red herring of morality has been drawn for years past across the trail of the Standard.

REFUSAL OF EVIDENCE.

A commission, known from the name of its chairman, as the Hepburn Commission, was appointed by Congress in 1879 to investigate the New York railroads and a number of Standard Oil officials, notably Messrs. H. H. Rogers, J. D. Archbold, Jabez A. Bostwick, and W. T. Sheide were summoned before it. Though not so sweeping in their denials as Mr. Rockefeller, all of them avoided the truth. Their testimony in fact was so evasive that the Hepburn Commission, in making its report, characterised the company as "a mysterious organisation whose business and transactions are of such a character that its members decline giving a history or description of it lest this testimony be used to convict them of a crime." The reason that the witnesses themselves gave for their evasion was—as might be expected—a different one from that assigned by the Commission. They stated that the investigations were an interference with their rights as private citizens, and that the Government had no business to inquire into their methods. This is a very interesting plea, for it throws a light on the general spirit of insubordination to all law and order consistently evinced by the Standard Oil Trust throughout its whole career whenever law and order were found to be in opposition to its progress. This constant opposition to the public authority, whether manifested by open contempt of Court when under examination, or by secret bribery to avert or compass legislation, or by secret acts known to be contrary to law, has been such as to merit for the Standard Oil conspirators the appellation of the anarchists of commercial life, for opposition to the law, denial of the law, refusal to be subject to the law, and attempted corruption of the officers of the law, indelibly marks their business policy.

Direct lying, however, was employed on occasion when Standard witnesses were under the necessity of answering questions categorically. Henry M. Flagler, for instance, swore in 1880 in the Court of Common Pleas (Stand. Oil Co. vs. W. C. Scofield et al.) that the Standard Oil Company neither owned, operated, nor controlled refineries elsewhere than at Cleveland, Ohio, and Bayonne, N.J., whereas before the Investigation Relative to Trusts, New York Senate, 1888, he testified that in 1874 the Standard Oil Company purchased the refineries of Lockhart, Frew and Co., of Pittsburg; Warden, Frew and Co., of Philadelphia; and Chas. Pratt and Co., of New York. Mr. Rockefeller also swore falsely in the Scofield case, as above, in 1880, in the same sense as Mr. Henry M. Flagler. The purchase and consequent control of the Pittsburg, Philadelphia, and New York refineries mentioned was absolutely secret at the time, and seemingly not likely to be found out.

BRIBERY AND INTIMIDATION.

The Standard Oil people have undoubtedly practised bribery throughout a long series of years and on the most comprehensive scale, and that not merely to avert a temporary danger or get themselves out of an unexpected scrape, but as a matter of ordinary business routine. They bribed high and low, in season and out of season. The Hearst letters published in my second article show their attempts on the Legislature and the press. This is how Mr. F. S. Monnett, State Attorney-General of Ohio (whose activity in enforcing the anti-Trust law against the Standard in that State earned him a special denunciation in Mr. J. D. Archbold's letters to Senator Foraker), described his personal experiences in the matter to a representative of the press in July, 1899, when on a visit to London:—

"It happened in this way: Mr. Chas. B. Squires is a well-known business man in Cleveland, president of the Manhattan Insurance Company, and in no way connected with the Standard. Owing to my fighting the insurance trust in Ohio I saw a good deal of him. One day a man called on Squires, saying that he represented Frank Rockefeller (brother of J.D.) and Charles V. Haskell, both Standard Oil men. This man asked Squires whether the Attorney-General could be 'reached.' Squires replied (according to his story to me) that if anybody could 'reach' him he could. This representative mentioned the Trust names, and showed Squires a telegram stating that he had authority to 'reach' the Attorney-General, and that there would be a liberal reward for him if things were dickered. The man offered Squires $100,000. Squires said that would amount to nothing at all; that he would not attempt such a job for less than $500,000. Finally he was authorised to offer $400,000 (£80,000) to the Attorney-General if he would let the case stand adjourned over his term of office [this was the prosecution of the Standard by the State of Ohio as an illegal trust], and $100,000 was for Squires and the go-between. I was at Washington, and got a telegram from Squires: 'Do nothing till I see you.' When I did see him he made this proposition. . . . . This is not the first case of the kind during this litigation, for one of my predecessors, Mr. Watson, was offered $100,000 in much the same way. It is, moreover, quite in accordance with the general policy of the Trust."

In fact, in that year—1899—the Annual Report of Mr. Monnett to the Governor of the State of Ohio contains detailed charges of six deliberate attempts to bribe Mr. David K. Watson, his predecessor in office, to withdraw suits entered against the Standard Oil Company of Ohio. Mr. Watson, however, was not to be bribed; neither was he to be intimidated, though Senator Marcus A. Hanna, the personal friend and financier of President McKinley, and one of the most influential Republican politicians in America, wrote to him stating that he had always considered him "in the line of political promotion," and then went on to intimate that unless the suit against the Standard was withdrawn Watson would be the object of vengeance by the Corporation and its friends forever after. As if to clinch his threat and argument, Hanna wrote:—"You have been in politics long enough to know that no man in public office owes the public anything." This last phrase remained a potent weapon in the hands of Mr. Hanna's enemies till the day of his death.

PHYSICAL FORCE.

It will be necessary to return to the subject of bribery when we come to the marketing business of the Trust. We will now pass to a few examples of the resort to open violence for the attainment of the Trust's ends. The Tidewater Pipe Line was started by Lombard, Ayres, and Co., New York refiners, and others, on the publication of the Rutter circular; and Mr. Rockefeller offered at first to buy them out—pipes, refineries, and all—but refused finally to give the price of $15,000,000 they asked. The Standard's next move was the purchase of a certain minority of the shares in the Tidewater Company. On January 17, 1883, the Standard stockholders held a hugger-mugger meeting at the Tidewater office in Titusville, without notifying the stockholders generally, voted the turning over of the control to Standard Oil interests, and took possession of the office in the name of that company. The president of the Tidewater, however, who had been absent in New York, met this attempt by another equally determined. He carried the office by surprise, barricaded it, and kept forcible possession till a suit could be brought to declare the meeting void, which was legally accomplished. Previously to this all sorts of material obstacles had been put in the way of the Tidewater pipe getting to the sea; the railroads constantly opposed the company's obtaining a right of way, and mysterious individuals—obviously representing Standard interests—constantly cropped up along the proposed route, acquiring exclusive rights over strips of land running at right angles to the proposed right of way, some of these tiny ribbons of land being forty miles long. Finally, as I explained in my first article, the Tidewater Pipe Line became a Standard Oil tentacle.

In the case of the United States Pipe Line—organised by the independent oil producers and not to be confused with the United Pipe Lines, which were always a Rockefeller organisation—it has been clearly shown that the Standard Oil Company's representatives have resorted to similar means of obstruction. Physical force was used on several occasions, a notable instance being that of the crossing of the Delaware River at Hancock under the Erie Railroad bridge in 1893. Erie interests as such were in no wise affected by the crossing, and the president of the Erie road, after a conference with Mr. Emery, manager of the United States Pipe Line, had informed him that there would be no objection to going under the bridge, and even sent his own engineer to Hancock to make arrangements for the exact location of the pipe. When the connection from both sides of the river was about to be made, however, the railroad company ran up two engines and "wrecking cars," with about seventy-five men, and placed inflammable material over the ends of the pipe lines, so that on any attempt to connect they would be so heated that connection would become impossible. The spot was beleaguered by the hostile forces of the railroad and the pipe-line company for three months, when the latter abandoned the route and set its pipes seventy miles back to a place called Athens, Pa. The case for the United States Government in the Missouri prosecution says:—

> The obstruction came in part directly from the agents of the Standard Oil Company and partly from the railroads, but there is every reason to believe that the railroads were acting in the interests of the Standard Oil Company, as their own interests would scarcely be injured by the pipe line, and as they had (so far as the evidence shows) never opposed the construction of pipe lines by the Standard Oil Company.

I select another case from the year 1895, when the United States Pipe Line was getting in through the State of New Jersey to New York harbour. The account of it may be best given in the words of the Attorney-General's brief in the Missouri case:—

> When the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railroad was reached at Washington, N.J., serious opposition was again encountered. The pipe line company bought the fee simple title to land at a point where there was a culvert in the railroad and placed a pipe through this culvert, and put a force of men in charge. The next day two locomotives, a wrecker, and 150 men attempted by force to eject the employees of the pipe line from their position and to tear up the pipes. A hand-to-hand fight ensued, and finally an agreement was reached by which the matter was taken into court. Mr. Emery testifies that some of the same men who opposed the passage of the pipe under the tracks of the Erie Railroad at Hancock, N.Y., some two years before, were also among the representatives of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railroad in the trouble at Washington, N.J. After a delay of six months the lower Court decided in favour of the right of the pipe line to cross the tracks.

The Charge of Arson.

In 1879 the owners of the Vacuum Oil Works, of Rochester, N.Y., Messrs. H. B. and C. M. Everest, father and son, made over a three-fourths interest in their concern, which manufactured a patent lubricating oil, to the Standard Oil Company, the Everests remaining managers on a salary, and also being co-directors along with Messrs. H. H. Rogers, J. D. Archbold, and Ambrose McGregor, of the Standard Oil Trust, of which the Vacuum Oil Company was now run as a subsidiary. The following year three of the employees, Wilson, Matthews, and Miller, having got some money together, thought that they would like to start refining on their own account, and did so, setting up the Buffalo Lubricating Oil Company in the town of Buffalo. C. M. Everest warned them he would do all in his power to injure their concern. He tried especially, by an offer of $20,000, to get Miller, who was the most practical refiner of the three, to break his contract with his two new partners, and on June 7, 1881, H. B. Everest took Miller to the office of his lawyer, Mr. Geo. Truesdale, in order to come to an arrangement with him. Mr. Truesdale afterwards testified as follows in regard to this interview (Proceedings in Relation to Trusts, House of Representatives, 1888, Report No. 3,112, p. 864):—

> I told him (Miller) that I did not know the exact terms of his contract, but if he had entered into a contract and violated it I presumed there would be a liability for damages as well as a liability for the debts of the Buffalo party. Mr. Miller and Everest both talked on the subject, and Mr. Everest says, "I think there are other ways for Miller to get out of it." I told him I saw no way except either to back out or to sell out; no other honourable way. Mr. Everest says, substantially, I think, in these words: "Suppose he should arrange the machinery so it would bust up, or smash up, what would the consequences be?"—something to that effect. "Well," I says, "in my opinion, if it is negligently, carelessly done, not purposely done, he would be only civilly liable for damages caused by his negligence; but if it was wilfully done there would be a further criminal liability for malicious injury to the property of the parties—the company. Mr. Everest said he thought there wouldn't be anything, only civil liability, and said that would—he referred to the fact that I had been police justice, had some experience in criminal law—and he said that he would like to have me look up the law carefully on that point, and that they would see me again.

Shortly afterwards Miller blew up a still in the Buffalo Works twice over by overheating, but did no further damage beyond spoiling the 175 barrels of oil contained in the still. He absconded, was kept in idleness, or semi-idleness, by the Vacuum Company at a salary of $1,500 a year, and the latter company proceeded to harass the Buffalo Lubricating Oil Company out of existence by taking one vexatious action after another against it on the ground of infringement of patents. These were all decided in favour of the Buffalo Company by the Courts except in one case, for a purely technical infringement it was condemned to pay six cents (3d.) damages. Finally the Buffalo Company turned on its adversary and took an action against the Vacuum Oil Company directors, H. H. Rogers, J. D. Archbold, A. McGregor, and the two Everests for criminal conspiracy, instituting at the same time civil suits for damages. The trial, at which Mr. J. D. Rockefeller and all the forces of the Standard Oil were mustered, aided by the most eminent counsel in the States, came off at Buffalo on May 2, 1886, and Messrs. Rogers, Archbold, and McGregor escaped owing to the judge withdrawing the case from the jury, because, although they were directors of the Vacuum Oil Company, it could not be proved that they had advised Miller to cause an explosion. The two Everests were condemned. By various means the Standard contrived to stay execution of the sentence until May, 1888, two years later; the statute provided a penalty of one year's imprisonment or $250 fine, or both. Great efforts were made to obtain a mitigation of the sentence. A petition signed by forty "leading citizens" of Rochester was handed in to the judge praying him on account of the "untarnished fidelity and integrity" of the convicted men to make the penalty as light as the Court was authorised by law to fix. In the result the two Everests were each fined $250 for the criminal offence, and the Vacuum Oil Company settled the civil suits for $85,000 (£17,000). This is the case on which the late Mr. Henry D. Lloyd (whose work, "Wealth against Commonwealth," was the first to expose the Standard's misdeeds) based the caustic remark: "The Standard Oil Trust is explosive at one end and evangelical at the other."

NOTES FROM PARIS.

"THE split in the Republican party," said to have been engineered and brought about by the Prime Minister, is not what it seems at a distance. He, with marvellous cleverness, avoided all the issues taken by those who interpellated him, and contrived to play on the chord which terrifies the millions who have only small reserves of capital, especially the millions in the country. It would have been impossible to make clear to them that those who went against M. Briand were not for violence and destruction as a means to confiscation and communism. The greater number of those Republicans who appeared in the division list with him were far more in feeling with M. Cruppi. Those who abstained or were absent en congé were hostile to him, but thought with many of their friends that it would be better to await another opportunity to come down on the Cabinet. As it was, he must have been defeated if the Progressists had not—in spite of the presence of M. Laferre, ex-Grand Master of the Grand Orient, in the Ministry. The complexion which the Tsar's visit to Berlin took was played on in a manner to alarm the hundred and seventy newcomers to the Chamber, who may be said not to have yet their sea legs in a tempestuous debate. The advice given by different Sovereigns who have visited Paris within the last five years, and of their diplomatic representatives, was also largely used in bringing round these raw recruits.

This reminds me that the saloon at the Elysée in which Ministers meet under the presidency of M. Fallières might be taken in some degree as symbolical of the lurking leaven of monarchism. The apartment I speak of is at the left end of the long suite of State rooms on the ground floor. A long passage and a wide ante-room separate it from the private sitting-room of the President on the same floor, but in a nearly detached low building. The saloon in question is known as the salon argenté. There Napoleon spent the last day that he passed in Paris, and Louis Napoleon the nights of December 1 and 2, 1851, anxiously awaiting news of the Coup d'Etat. The silver decorations have a moonshine aspect, in which, perhaps, symbolists might find a meaning. They are due to the taste of Prince Henry of Reuss, the diplomat and half-brother of the Queen of Bulgaria. The Empress Eugénie took a great fancy to him, and badly wanted him to be named ambassador to Paris instead of "the Orson Bismarck." She consulted him about the redecoration of the Elysée, when that palace was being overhauled to serve as a future residence for her son, and for herself in the event of widowhood. He probably thought of the salon of Frederick the Great at Sans Souci when he advised silvered instead of gilded decorations.

The most conspicuous decoration of this room, which was to have been the Empress's own drawing-room, are the medallion portraits, bust size. They represent the different sovereigns who reigned in the sixties, and they are inserted in the deep cornice. When, as he often does, M. Fallières during a palaver between Ministers, or a wrangle, throws himself back in his arm-chair and gazes upwards, he can see five of these crowned heads. The central one, robed in white, wears a pectoral cross. A bland smile plays on his face, and he seems in a mood to bless. He is Pius IX. On the opposite side is an Oriental capped with a crimson fez. This is the Pope of the Moslem world, Abdul Aziz. The diamonds on the front of the fez and the jewels of orders crowded on the chest are brilliantly rendered. The painter had to work from a photo in reproducing the features of this Father of the Faithful, a religious scruple standing in the way of a more direct mode of working. But he had access to the Imperial belongings that have so fine an effect. Queen Victoria, looking staid, inanimate, official, is in a low dress with the blue ribbon of the Garter athwart her breast. The President cannot see her when he casts his eyes upwards. But he has a view of the jovial Isabella II., in a magnificent diadem, necklace, white blond dress, with just a corner of a crimson velvet mantle peeping out. It is the gorgeous mantle she used to wear at her dinners. Were a full view of this mantle given, the President would see, embroidered on it in gold, the heraldic arms of the twelve kingdoms of Spain. Francis Joseph, slim in the shoulders and yet young, faces Victor Emmanuel, the most robust and bluff of the whole cornice party. Pedro V., representing Portugal, bears a sort of likeness to Ary Scheffer's picture of "Mignon regrettant la patrie." The unhappy-looking Alexander II. is opposite to the enigmatic Napoleon III., and William I. of Prussia is beside William III. of the Netherlands. Leopold I. manifestly wears his brown wig, though realism had not come into fashion in the sixties. A youth with a bulging and tall forehead that might either signify brains or water on the brain, is the youngest divinity in this strange Olympus. Saxony, Wurtemberg, Sweden, and Denmark are on the side to which the President turns his back. He sometimes finds food for reflection in gazing on these departed sovereigns.

A British Council at which the sovereign appears is purely formal. An Elysian one is lively, though not informal. Sometimes, as we say of the Chamber, it grows "animated." The presence of the head of the State alone prevents discussion from becoming stormy. This was often the case when the late strike loomed, first in the far, and then some months later in the nearer, distance. When the Senate sent the Western Railway Purchase Bill down to the Chamber there were some breezy Councils owing to M. Millerand having made a sturdy fight in defence of the public purse, and wanting to save about six millions sterling, but only succeeding in saving one million six hundred thousand pounds. As the State had lent the company on mortgage far more than it could ever pay, and as the whole Western system and plant needed everywhere complete renewal, he contended that in all fairness to the public the mortgages ought to be simply foreclosed. For political reasons he was not, however, disposed to refuse all "compensation." I may here say that the compensation terms, in being suddenly disclosed at the Luxembourg, gave occasion for a famous coup de Bourse.

President Fallières talks freely at Councils about foreign affairs. Ambassadors sometimes say to him what they would not say to the Foreign Minister, because no official record is kept of what passes between them and the President. When the Cabinet is a "happy family" he seeks to pacify and apply the balm of soft words to wounded feelings. He is fond of a jocular mot. If he never mounts the high horse he has a sense of functional dignity, and only passes round the cigar case when the door-window is open and all can go out on the terrace. There is no Clerk of the Council, and never has there been one since the fall of the Gambetta Cabinet, at the end of a six weeks' life. The only official record of what passes in the Silver Salon is the short compendium given to the press at the Ministry of the Interior. It is never very frank or informing. The place taken by Ministers at the Council Board depends on the date of creation of their several Ministries.

The office of Prime Minister dates, it is said, from King Dagobert, and that of Finance Minister from Charles VII., who placed Jacques Cœur as his argentier at the head of his finances. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs first took a distinct character in the reign of Louis XIV., though the thing in a shapeless sort of way long before existed. The Minister of Justice as Chancellor of France is an ancient office, and in troubled periods when Princes of the Blood might be brought to the block was one of almost sovereign importance.

The fears whispered in the lobby of the Chamber that the Tsar's visit to Berlin might lead to another Triple Empire Alliance have blown over. The Tsar went to Berlin because he owed a visit there, and to remove misunderstanding about Persia. The German Emperor had grown a little restive under the exciting action of the Persians at Constantinople. He began to think that there was a deep-laid scheme to create a "Persian Morocco" for the benefit of Russia and Great Britain. Whether these fears were allayed by what diplomats call a term of frank explanation, or whether a troisième larron was brought into the combination complained of from Stamboul, I cannot say. But it is certain that the Emperor is now satisfied and ready to smooth away difficulties between Russia and Austria.

France has received the assurance that the Tsar is attached to the policy of his never-to-be-forgotten father in standing by the Russo-French Alliance, and that he will prove a firm ally while France continues to be the vigorous, orderly, patriotic, and closely knit nation that he has always known her.

Can Tolstoy be mad? His works are much read here. They are as caviare to the intellectual public and strangely exotic. The fact of his leaving his wife to live as a hermit at the age of eighty-two seems more astonishing than anything he has ever written. French doctors now teach that we are the age of our veins. A French doctor who examined Tolstoy in his last grave illness predicted recovery, and did not see why he might not hope to live to a hundred, his veins were so elastic and "young" in being completely free from sclerosis.

What to do with one's sons? The sons—in France—are solving the problem for themselves: they are becoming aviators. Those who can afford to spend a few thousand pounds a year become amateurs, the rest professionals, and it would not surprise me if ladies of pluck and nerve were soon to seek in greater numbers than at present fame and monetary independence in the same career. Mme. Bob Walter did a good thing for herself in taking to motoring and to the motor business.

The rich aviator gets notoriety and, if not glory, gloriole, which may do as well. Any breakneck enterprise is safe to give at least three or four days' fame. The professionals stand a sporting chance of making a fortune in a few years—that is if their aviations win a few prizes and if they quickly turn their venture into a limited company. The profits look handsome. A young man of undoubted nobility and ancient family and title, who has taken to the manufacture of aeroplanes, tells me that an apparatus that he sells for £300 costs £60. "It will be," he says, "well to put on a stiff price, because you can then offer a 20 per cent. discount for cash and thus please the buyer." "But where did you learn the principles of mechanical construction?" I asked. "I know nothing about them beyond what I pick up casually; but there are always a lot of young engineers on the lookout for a job, and I get them to design an aeroplane for me." "You construct at your works, I suppose?" "I have no works. You see, as my capital is low—only a few hundred pounds—I am anxious to avoid all monetary risk and expenses beyond that of a one-room office and stationery. My greatest expense so far has been in visiting cards and a tailor. I am particular about my cards and my clothes. I get my aeroplanes made for me by constructors. I have already sent out two to South America, and fresh orders come in thence. The wide, dusty pampas there call for aeros. The ground heat in the long summers there is distressing, but sailing high in the air is, under the sky of cobalt blue, a far greater pleasure than in Europe."

I know another young man, also of genuinely aristocratic birth, who has just gone through the two years of military service, and, as he has not found any terra firma profession to his taste, he has taken to the air. He has an income of a little over £400 a year, which is quite insufficient for an amateur. Nobody whose income is well under £4,000 can afford to keep an aeroplane. I observed to him that he would run through his little fortune in four or five years. He replied to this:—

"I hope to break my neck before then, and if I do not I will blow my brains out. At any rate, people will then talk of me. There is an off-chance that I may marry an heiress, or an actress who has a large income. Paris offers amazing resources to the titled sportsmen who have got to the end of their monetary tether. Just look at the haul one of the numerous Comtes de Mailly made by marrying Maggie Gauthier. Poor De Chaulnes made another haul by marrying Shont's daughter, of New York. He was equally used up in pocket and in health from being a morphiomaniac. Had he not been so foolish as to take offence at something his wife said and to commit suicide, he would now, through Shont's agency, be at the head of a great Franco-American journal and the largest Franco-American express business that ever was." "As a handsome trooper and Marquis, you ought to do well in the marriage market, especially were there some aviation feat to your credit." "That is so. However, à la grâce de Dieu!"

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

"NOO," asked one Scotch Nonconformist of another, dear Lady Betty, "hoo monny d'ye thank there are of the elact on the arth at the moment?" "Eh, mabbee a dozen," was the answer. The Peers imagine there are but some six hundred superior persons in the British Isles, and that the remainder of the population would quickly ruin the country were the right to exercise the Veto withdrawn from the members of the House of Lords.

The application of the story would be incomplete were the answer of the Scotchman who asked the question omitted. "Hoot mon! Nae so monny as that," he exclaimed. Each Peer, moreover, is convinced that most of his colleagues in the Upper House are hopelessly incompetent.

A distinguished leader of the Tory party recently said:—"I command a force which is figuratively armed with pikes and cross-bows; it is like burlesque Feudalism opposed to Progress in earnest."

. . . . .

The "I-do-not-know-what-we-are-coming-to" style of mind is especially provided for, and is the main support of the Tory party. That state of mind has in continuous succession had all its forecasts of evil disproved by events, yet it predicts catastrophes as unconcernedly as ever.

Some sixty years ago there was published the "Random Recollections of the Oldest Inhabitant," and a few verses of this forgotten poem may be quoted here to illustrate what has just been said:—

"I recollect that none would deem Gas could be made to answer,
And he that spoke of going by steam
Was thought a mere romancer;
The gas, they said, must sure explode,
But—contradiction flat—
Now have we been by gas blown up?
I don't remember that.

"I recollect a clever man,
Once clearly demonstrated,
No steamer to America
Could e'er be navigated;
He showed how coals could never last
The Atlantic voyage through,
But now do steamers make the trip?
I think sometimes they do.

"I recollect folks did declare
Old jog-trot ways the best,
And thought that things just as they were Should be allowed to rest.
That everything improved upon
Brought ruin to the spot;
But have we lost by moving on?
I recollect it not."

. . . . .

In "Through the Looking-glass" Alice holds up a kitten to the mirror, and says:—"Now, Kitty, the room you see through the glass is just the same as ours—only the things go the opposite way." On the surface Belgravia resembles the other districts in London and England, but the aims, objects, occupations, experiences, and usages of the former differ as greatly from those of the latter as writing looked at directly from the same writing reflected in a looking-glass. Is it possible then that in the greatly altered conditions which prevail the "upper class" will be permitted to continue to direct the destinies of those whose interests are so contrary to their own? It would be madness to attempt it.

There is a new public in England. They take batches of working-men to Germany to study the life of the labourer in that country. More necessary is it that batches of peers should be taken to the suburbs of London and to the manufacturing centres in the provinces to study the conditions and requirements of those who live there. Political England is no longer bounded by Westminster, the Strand, Oxford Street, and South Kensington.

"French Line Engravings of the Late XVIIIth Century," by H. W. Lawrence and Basil Dighton—Lawrence and Jellicoe—will be published at the end of the month. Only 1,150 copies of the book will be printed; the price of the 1,000 is five, of the remainder eight, guineas. It is a work which no collector of French engravings or of English books should fail to secure, and the eighty full-page plates are such exquisite reproductions that the volume may be expected to rise in value almost immediately after publication.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

CORRESPONDENCE.

COST OF LIVING IN THE EAST.

DEAR TRUTH,—Your correspondent of the 9th inst., "A Western Woman," strikes the right nail on the head, though I do not think she drives it home enough. If the East is such an expensive place, and if a bachelor on a "small" stipend and no private means finds that he cannot afford to marry a woman of his own class, we have ourselves to thank for this state of things.

Let us see what a young man does when he first goes out on, roughly, £20 a month. I will restrict myself to Burma, for here I can speak with certainty.

(1) He joins the club. This costs him Rs.75 to Rs.100 donation, and about Rs.12 a month subscription. The Gymkhana, on which he is dependent for his games, costs him Rs.10 per month subscription.

(2) Nine men out of ten buy a pony, and, by-and-by, having cultivated a taste for horseflesh, they keep two or three. Not a few keep "tum-tums."

(3) He soon gets into the system of "chits," which to my mind is the curse of the East. Nobody carries money about; all payments are settled by "signing," and month in and month out the bills come in. The most pressing ones, such as club bills and bridge losings, are paid at once, while others, such as tradesmen's bills, are promptly shelved, and this goes on ad infinitum. It must be patent to everybody that it is very difficult to keep a check on one's expenditure when money does not leave one's pocket.

(4) He plays bridge for inordinately high points. In England 5s. a hundred is looked upon as high. In Burma the regular points are Rs.5 a hundred (about 6s. 8d.). This is probably due to the fact that he never pays up his losings "on the nail"; he signs a chit for Rs. 30 or Rs. 40, and hopes next day to make this up. He may or may not do so, but still no money changes hands, and at the end of the month "it all goes down on the club bill," and if he is a heavy loser, he goes on playing, hoping to have a good month this time. This also goes on ad infinitum.

(5) When he goes out on tour, he travels with a young wine cellar and a diminutive grocer's shop, obtained by the ever-accommodating "chit."

There is no need for me to dwell upon his personal extravagance, for a man who is extravagant by nature need not necessarily go out to the East to show his aptitude for spending money, but I think I may safely say that the East calls for more extravagance than the West.

A man goes out to the East because primarily he starts on a higher salary than he is likely to get in England, and this ought to be an inducement to him to save until he has made sufficient to retire. As a matter of fact, he cannot do this, because the conditions of life under which he is called upon to live render it impossible. So long as our system and standard of living in the East are what they are now, men will be unable to save, and it may be years before they can afford to marry, if ever. En attendant. . . . Well. . . . Yours truly, K.

FORTUNE-HUNTING PARSONS.

Sir,—Kindly permit me to say a few words further on the correspondence provoked by my letter which you published on October 26.

My only object in troubling you with that letter was to suggest an oversight in a previous remark in Truth respecting the motives which lead young men to take Holy Orders. It seemed, and still seems, to me inevitable that facts which are to be seen very frequently must suggest to a certain number of wordly-wise young men that the position of a curate, and still more a vicar, presents unrivalled opportunities of making a good marriage. I did not say, as some subsequent correspondents seem to assume, that this motive for going into the Church is general or common. But I did add a further point, which I should have thought incontrovertible, that a good many men, with whatever motives and aspirations they may have entered the clerical profession, are tempted to leave it by the opportunities that come to them of marrying rich women. When I say "leave it" I mean that they retire from regular clerical employment, sometimes restricting themselves to occasional duty, sometimes doing none at all, sometimes even dropping the clerical designation and dress and rejoining the ranks of the laity.

Different inferences may be drawn from the facts, but it surprises me that any one should question the facts themselves. One can only speak in such matters from one's own experience. So far as my own goes, I could not count on my fingers the number of clergymen of my acquaintance who have married comfortably dowered wives. As to my original statement about men who after marriage "retire from the active exercise of their profession," I can recall four instances to the point. My experience covers a period of about twenty-five years. I cannot suppose that it is unique. I do not blame the men who retire. They had no prospect of obtaining preferment; and a curate's position can hardly be congenial to men of middle age.—Yours obediently,

A Layman.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

The Political Disturbance—Markets Preparing for a General Election.

THERE were happenings of importance for the Stock Markets last week. The two outstanding events were the final breakdown of the Conference of representatives of the Government and Opposition upon the question of limiting the veto of the House of Lords and the elections in the United States. Although both events have already had some influence upon prices, the developments that must arise from both will help materially to shape the course of prices for some time to come. At home, the reopening of the Constitutional question means a renewal of the bitter party animosity—accompanied, it is to be feared, with a fresh outbreak of class recrimination—and until the General Election is out of the way a certain amount of disturbance to Stock Exchange business is inevitable. It is negatively consoling that, owing to a variety of circumstances, with which I dealt in previous articles, all the inflation has been knocked out of domestic securities, so that at the worst the political nuisance should depress prices to a very small extent. Probably the effect will be practically confined to retarding the recovery that had set in just before the failure of the Conference was announced.

In addition to politics, Consols were last week affected by the sales made to prepare for the New Zealand loan of £5,000,000 that was publicly offered on Friday. The issue took the form of 3½ per cent. bonds at 98½, repayable at par in December, 1914, or convertible earlier into 3½ per cent. inscribed stock upon favourable terms. As the new bonds allowing for repayment in 1914 were offered on terms which gave a yield of £4 2s. per cent., they were readily subscribed. The third reason for last week's set-back in Consols, which dipped as low as 78 11/16 cash, was the realisation of a large line on behalf of the Birkbeck Bank, consequent upon the run made against that institution. This matter is dealt with in an article in another column, and here it will be sufficient to mention that the Birkbeck has emerged triumphantly from this ordeal.

RAILWAYS.

Home Rails Steady Despite Labour Troubles—Wonderful Trade Figures—An Antidote to Tariff Reform Poison—Stocks that are Cheap.

Labour troubles in the northern shipbuilding and Welsh coal trades, and the Constitutional crisis, have served to repress enthusiasm in the Home Railway market, but there has been very little set-back in prices. So far as the lock-out of boilermakers is concerned, it has been stated that the dispute from the masters' point of view has arisen at the least inconvenient time, for while they are saving considerably in wages, the cessation of work will give them a chance of disposing of surplus stocks accumulated during a period when orders were few and construction was proceeded with mainly in order to keep the yards going. Whether this assertion be true or not it is a little remarkable to observe how slight has been the effect upon the traffic returns of the railways. The lines serving the shipbuilding centres in the north have throughout the industrial stoppage not ceased to publish gross increases in their takings, and this being so the rate of progress attained when the shipbuilding trade is again in full swing should be marked. There is abundant evidence—one finds it crystallised each month in the Board of Trade Returns—that general trade throughout the country is in an exceedingly satisfactory state. Imports for the past ten months were valued at no less than £545,000,000, or nearly £43,000,000 more than in the same months of last year, and £12,500,000 more than in the first ten months of 1907, when previous records were exceeded. Our total exports in the ten months were £360,000,000, or £45,000,000 more than in the corresponding period of last year. Of the total manufactured exports accounted for as much as £284,000,000; this is some £5,000,000 less than the figures for the corresponding period of 1907, but 1907 was a year of inflated prices. This year's volume of trade is much greater than in 1907, indeed, as Mr. Asquith pointed out at the Guildhall Banquet on Wednesday, had the exported manufactures of 1907 been valued at the prices of the present year, the total for the ten months would have been from £9,000,000 to £10,000,000 less than those experienced in the corresponding period of the current year. From the point of view merely of the Home Railway market (with which I am concerned at the moment), it is a pity that the bulk of the press has become so infected with the poison of Tariff Reform that it is unable to invite the country to take a little legitimate pride in the wonderful industrial vitality of this tight little island. We do not want back those vain-glorious days when one Englishman was openly declared to be equal to three foreigners, but it is time the mischievous, unpatriotic, and baseless bleat that the English are no match for any foreigner, uttered daily for years by the Tariff Reform papers and repeated only the louder now that the facts give them the lie direct, were stilled. I might then be relieved from having to attend to requests from correspondents to supply lists of investments abroad—not asked for, be it noted, because of the lower credit and consequent higher interest as a rule obtainable upon foreign investments, but because the idea has been spread that capital is less safe at home than amongst foreigners. "Anywhere but in this accursed country!" was the proviso made by one gentleman who wrote me the other day to supply him with a list of investments. The Jingo Tariff Reform twisters of facts and figures, who have educated the public, or a section of it, up to this pitch of patriotic love for the land of their birth, should be feeling proud of their handiwork.

However, the barriers of prejudice erected against domestic securities are being broken down by the force of facts, and so far as the Home Railway market is concerned shrewd people have lately been laying in stocks in advance of the batch of dividends to be declared in the new year. Those who have followed my remarks and who bought some of the dividend-paying stocks a few weeks ago already command profits, and the chances are in favour of values going better between now and the early part of 1911. One of the cheapest stocks in the list is Great Northern Deferred. The Great Northern for eighteen weeks of the half-year has a published increase in gross receipts of £49,500, equal to over £70,000 for the full twenty-six weeks. The company pays the dividend on its deferred stock once a year—namely, in February. For 1909 the stock got 1¾ per cent. In the June half of 1910 the company, after putting aside £20,000 to reserve (an innovation for the first half of the year, although £20,000 was also set aside last December), carried forward an increased balance of £56,000, which means that the deferred stock to June 30 had earned 2½ per cent. A net increase of £42,000 in the current six months would provide a further ½ per cent. on the deferred, bringing the rate up to 3 per cent. for the year 1910. On such a basis the stock at its present price would return a yield of no less than 6½ per cent. Perhaps it would be as well, for the purpose of an estimate, to suggest a total dividend of 2¾ per cent., which would require an addition in the divisible balance this half-year of £21,000. Such an amount ought to be forthcoming without difficulty, and the yield on Great Northern Deferred, allowing for accrued dividend, would still be practically 6 per cent. to a present purchaser.

Brighton "A" is another stock which is deservedly attracting the investor and speculator. Traffic returns on the Brighton are shaping excellently; already for eighteen weeks there is a gross increase of £30,000, so that my estimate of October 12 of an advance of £40,000 for the half-year looks like being exceeded. For the year 1909 Brighton "A" got a dividend of 4 per cent., and an extra ¼ per cent. was placed to its credit at June 30. To provide a further ½ per cent. and thus raise the dividend on Berthas for 1910 to 4¾ per cent. requires a net increase in the current six months of £25,500, and this ought to be forthcoming. Brighton "A" bought at 93½ cum a dividend of 4¾ per cent. will yield 5¼ per cent. As I have before pointed out the company is now reaping the reward of its enterprise in electrifying its South London line, and the success attending this experiment has decided it to proceed with the electrification of the line to the Crystal Palace. The work on this portion of the company's system has begun, and according to the chairman, the electrical installation will be ready for the Pageant of Empire at the Crystal Palace in May next.

Amongst the Heavy stocks Great Westerns are as promising as any, because the Western has, in the first place, to reap the benefit of a large amount of capital expenditure that has not had time to become reproductive, and in the second has yet to feel the advantages arising from the working agreement recently effected with the South Western. To date in the half-year the Great Western has a published gain in traffic of £173,000, and allowing for a continuance of good takings and for under publication, the advance for the half-year may be nearly £300,000. In the December half of 1909 the company paid a dividend on its ordinary stock at the rate of 7 per cent., and in June last at the rate of 4 per cent., making 5½ per cent. for the twelve months. To pay another 1 per cent. per annum for the half-year (or ½ per cent. actual), and thereby raise the dividend on Westerns to a 6 per cent. basis, requires a sum of £180,000. Prospects are in favour of this increase being available, and, if so, Great Westerns at current price would return a yield of 5 per cent., enough to render the stock an attractive investment.

The Sumatra Companies—Strathmore—A Comparison of the Older and the Younger Companies.

After the erratic movements of the past few months the price of fine hard Para seems to have settled down to something like steadiness, and for more than a month past the raw article has remained in the region of 6s. per lb. The amount of business which passes is insufficient to reduce stocks, but the increased confidence which now prevails is well indicated by the freedom with which consumers are making contracts for 1911 delivery. Holders of stocks show no desire to force them on to the market, and buyers prefer to cover their future requirements before bidding actively for immediate supplies. Bear tactics have failed to bring out stocks, and both buyers and sellers are playing a waiting game. Any drop in price below 6s. brings buyers into the market and rapidly restores the quotation.

The small dimensions to which speculative commitments in Rubber shares have been reduced gives the market a somewhat lifeless tone, but the moderate amount of investment buying which has taken place during the week amply sufficed to maintain prices and at times even to give them an appearance of strength, changes on the week, although small, being mostly in the right direction. The new issues are said to have justified the courage of their sponsors, and underwriting for the new appeals which are in preparation appears to be obtainable without much difficulty. Higher prices for Rubber are generally anticipated for the new year, and the feeling seems to be spreading that the share market is in for good active times in the near future. Malaccas have been firmer at 7⅛ as against 6¾ at the beginning of the month, and there has been some disposition on the part of holders of the company's debentures to sell the latter and buy the ordinary and preference issues. The shares, of course, lack the security of the debentures, but it is felt that the improving outlook reduces the risk of the exchange to a minimum. Jequié, to which I drew attention last week, has been actively dealt in on the statement issued by the company, and the shares which a fortnight ago stood at 2s. 9d. have since changed hands at 5s. Kajang, which I recommended recently at a trifle over par, has now reached 1¾. Official confirmation of the rumoured Linggi subsidiary is wanting, but the shares have been in demand up to 47s. Sumatra issues generally have been in favour, United Serdang improving to 5¾ and Tandjong (18s. paid) to 2¼ premium. At last year's Serdang meeting Mr. Lampard estimated the company's output for 1910-11 at 60,000 lbs., but as the first two months of the year have yielded 24,500 lbs. the year's total promises to be nearer 160,000 lbs. than 60,000 lbs. The future yields of Sumatra properties have usually been calculated on a most moderate basis, but it seems quite likely that the yields in the best districts of Sumatra will be quite equal to those obtained in the Malay Peninsula, and United Serdang, with its 8,000 acres of rubber, is very moderately valued by the market at about £130 per acre. Small dividends are now being paid from coffee, and some day the company will rank as a very large producer. Tandjong is another fine property with 3,000 acres of rubber somewhat younger, but in excellent condition, and as the present quotation of the share is equivalent to about £80 per acre it is not by any means over-valued. Just as some companies are over-valued by reason of the inflated prospectus estimates put forward by promoters, so others suffer from the under-estimation of probable outputs, and another Sumatra issue, Lankat Rubber, seems to have suffered from the conservatism of its promoters. At anything like the present price of 2 the shares seem to be an attractive investment. The company took over the rubber estate planted by the well-known United Lankat Plantations, Limited, and the property has been most carefully developed from the commencement. Some 190,000 trees are now planted, of which 20,000 are about five years old. Tapping has already commenced in a small way, and will begin in earnest in January next. The estimated yield for 1911 is 20,000 lbs., and for 1912 90,000 lbs., but these estimates appear to be framed on very conservative lines, and should be well exceeded. I hear good accounts, too, of Sialang, now obtainable at 1 premium. When the company was floated in September, 1909, the lists were open only a few minutes, and the subscriptions amounted to over £2,000,000, the shares immediately going to a premium of ¾. By the end of the present year it is estimated that 3,000 acres should be under rubber, which in full bearing should not cost the company more than between £30 and £40 per acre.

A very satisfactory report has just been issued by the Strathmore company, which was included in the list of cheap shares published in these columns in September last. A year or two ago the company was out of favour, but latterly it has made great progress, and as I have previously reminded my readers, no class of company has proved more profitable to investors during the last twelve months than that which comprised what were known as backward estates. A year ago Yam Seng, I remember, was spoken of scornfully, its trees being said to suffer from "wet feet;" but effective drainage and good management have removed the trouble, and the shares to-day stand 200 per cent. higher than they did twelve months ago. A similar rise in Strathmore would not surprise me. The company's holdings in other companies render its position much stronger than would appear from an examination of the Rubber handbooks. Mr. Parry, for instance, bases his dividend estimates on the company's Strathmore estate only, but this does not represent one-half of the company's interests. For Strathmore, by its share holdings, owns two-thirds of the Ulu Buloh estate, in addition to a one-twentieth share of Riverside. The company's total acreage is as follows:—

STRATHMORE.

| Rubber Planted in:— | Strathmore Estate. Acres. | Two-thirds of Ulu Buloh Estate. Acres. | One-twentieth of Riverside Estate. Acres. | Total. Acres. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1906 | — | — | 2 | 2 |
| 1907 | 185 | 194 | 22 | 401 |
| 1908 | 159 | 122 | 13 | 294 |
| 1909 | 13 | 103 | — | 116 |
| 1910 | 26 | 51 | 35 | 112 |
| Total planted acreage | 383 | 470 | 72 | 925 |

Strathmore £1 shares (18s. paid) are now quoted at ¼ premium, but tested by the scale which I published recently their value would exceed £2 10s.; and after allowing for unsatisfactory growth in some of the fields there appears to be ample margin for a substantial advance in the present low quotation. On its board Strathmore has three successful planters, two of whom are on the directorates of Ulu Buloh and Riverside. Mr. Henly did a great deal for Strathmore, and Mr. Grieg, the present visiting agent, reporting under date of September 3, says "the general appearance of the estate all over is satisfactory," and the additional drainage recommended by Mr. Grieg is being taken in hand. The management of the Ulu Buloh estate, in which the company controls so large an interest, is in the hands of Mr. F. G. Harvey, the manager of Pataling, who is himself a shareholder and was one of the original owners of the property. Tapping has commenced on Riverside, some 150 twelve-year-old trees giving last year an average of 12 lbs. per tree, and in the course of seven months or so the company will be tapping 55,000 trees.

A correspondent asks me to give some further explanation of my preference for the shares of the coming producers over those which are now paying substantial dividends, and I give below a comparative table dealing with typical instances of three types of companies:—1. A large present dividend payer. 2. A company which has recently reached the producing stage. 3. A company which will not produce much rubber for a year or two. The table is intended to show the present position of the selected companies and their respective positions five years hence, after allowing for the increased yields which should by that time be obtained.

| — | Share Quotation | Price per Planted Acre. | 1910-11. Yield of Rubber per Acre. | 1910-11. 5s. lb Profit. Yield on Purchase Price. | 1915-16. Yield of Rubber per Acre. | 1915-16. 2s. lb Profit. Yield on Purchase Price. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Cicely | 45s. | £135 | 217 lbs | 12% | 600 lbs. | 13% |
| Tremelbye | 6 | £220 | 65 lbs | 8½% | 450 lbs. | 18% |
| Strathmore | 1½ | £50 | (no dividend until 1911-12. | | 300 lbs. | 40% |

Cicely, it will be noted, gives a yield of 12 per cent. on its present price, and the return to the investor will not be materially altered if in 1915-16 it can sell its output at a profit of 2s. per lb. But if the profit on rubber falls to 1s. per lb. the future yield on Cicely shares would be reduced to 6½ per cent.—an unsatisfactory return. Tremelbye, on the other hand, should now pay the investor 8½ per cent., and its dividends, instead of remaining stationary, should increase substantially after the current year, while in 1915-16 it should be in a much stronger position than it is to-day. Returns from Strathmore will not commence before 1911-12, but by 1915-16, with the limit of its development not nearly reached, 2s. per lb. profit would give a handsome return, and a profit of 1s. per lb. would still justify a much higher quotation for the shares.

An application for fresh capital is being made by Rubber Securities, Limited. The company made several successful flotations during the boom, and paid a dividend of 20 per cent. as the result of its first year's operations—a highly creditable performance. The issued capital consists of about 55,000 shares, and option certificates presumably are in existence for something approaching a similar amount, but the assets disclosed by the balance-sheet to May 31 last are very small, and after allowing for the substantial carry forward and for some appreciation in the company's assets (the details of which are not disclosed), it seems doubtful whether the new issue is worth a premium of 5s. per share. There is a heavy liability on the shares, and as the company relies largely on promotion business for its profits, it does not follow that a regular dividend of 20 per cent. will be maintained. It seems to me that the market value of the capital of a trust should not exceed the value of its assets, or the position becomes obviously insecure. In other markets the assets of a trust company not unfrequently exceed the market valuation of the capital. The boards of rubber trust companies generally show a regrettable desire to conceal the nature of their assets. It is unfortunate, I think, from the shareholders' point of view, and the only valid reason which can be urged in its favour is that in the event of the company parting with a holding which afterwards rises in value the directors are saved from having their judgment called into question. A company's holdings, of course, appear in the balance-sheet at their book value, and shareholders should at least insist upon being furnished with details as to their market value.

I have received several further communications with regard to Kamna, including a letter from Mr. Hilckes, who asks me to put several questions to the company. In view, however, of the obscurity of the position it seems not unlikely that the directors will make some statement, and I therefore postpone dealing with the matter.

MODERATE BUSINESS—RHODESIAN REVIVAL NIPPED IN THE BUD—KAFFIRS—ANOTHER BULLFINCH PROMOTION—RISE IN OROYA EXPLORATIONS AND LAKE VIEWS—BAUCHI TIN.

Business in mining shares has been on a moderate scale during the past week, but no decided general tendency has been in evidence. At one time Rhodesians made quite a cheerful showing, and the activity was suggestive of another boom not being very far off, but the political uncertainty nipped the movement in the bud.

Hopes are entertained that the Duke of Connaught's visit to Rhodesia will serve to revive public interest in the shares of concerns operating in that country, and the impending return of Mr. Abe Bailey to the City is another factor which some bulls attach importance to, but it may be doubted whether either of these circumstances will have much real influence among the speculating public. The enthusiasts have found some encouragement in the references to Rhodesian matters in the Goldfields report, and as the Kaffir outlook is not considered bright, it is thought Lord Harris at the Goldfields meeting next Tuesday will devote a larger portion of his speech this time to Rhodesian conditions. Last year, it may be remembered, he emphasised the necessity of making haste slowly with Rhodesian propositions, that country having provided so many disappointments in the past. Since his last speech, however, the Goldfields has floated the Shamva Mines and has acquired other Rhodesian mining interests, so that possibly Lord Harris may see his way to be a little more kind to the bulls of Rhodesians next week than he was last November.

In the Kaffir market business has continued on a small scale, and there seems to be no immediate likelihood of improvement, but as the end of the year draws nearer a little more demand may be noticeable for shares of the dividend-paying mines, whose quotations are nearly "full of dividend." The Transvaal gold output last month of 653,147 ozs. constitutes a fresh record, if allowance be made for the large amount of reserve gold included in the December, 1909, total of 660,643 ozs. The daily average production, however, was about 500 ozs. less last month than in September, which is not very surprising, having regard to the falling-off in the labour supply. Whereas in September the labour position on the gold mines improved to a small extent, last month they lost 2,097 natives, and at the end of October the number employed on the gold mines was 180,103, as against 183,964 at the end of May.

Telegraphic advices indicate that the excitement in Australia over the rich discoveries near the surface at the Bullfinch mine on the Yilgarn goldfield has not abated. On the contrary, there has been a big rush of prospectors to the district, and Bullfinch is now a tented town. Members of the Westralian Government, accompanied by the State Geologist, have visited the field, and it is announced that the Government has decided to construct forthwith a temporary water pipe line to the Bullfinch mine, and also to introduce a Bill for the immediate construction of a railway to the field. The latter announcement is significant, seeing that the Prime Minister is reported to have said about a fortnight ago that Parliament would only be asked to sanction a railway "should subsequent inquiries confirm the permanency of the new goldfield."

There have been some sharp fluctuations during the past week in the shares of the original Bullfinch Company. At the time of writing the price is practically £3. The shares of the East Bullfinch Proprietary, Limited, were introduced on the market last Wednesday, but so far they have failed to make headway. The company is capitalised at £120,000 in £1 shares, of which £30,000 is working capital and £40,000 is held in reserve. The company owns two blocks of ground on the eastern boundary of the original Bullfinch, and it is hoped to prove the extension of the latter's rich ore bodies, but it would appear that up to the present no work whatever has been done on the East Bullfinch property.

Oroya Explorations, to which I directed the attention of my readers last week, have been in steady request, and the price has advanced to just over a sovereign. This represents a market valuation of about £300,000, which sum does not seem unduly large, having regard to the numerous and promising interests of the company. An interim report has been issued to shareholders giving particulars of the company's various assets, a few only of which I mentioned last week. The Youanme properties (in which the Oroya Exploration has a direct half interest and an indirect eighth interest) look like becoming a big thing. The formation, I understand, is similar to that at the Sons of Gwalia. The Mountain Queen mine on the Yilgarn field is another promising venture. Ore reserves of a value of over £100,000 have already been opened up, and a treatment plant has been ordered. In this property, which is about to be floated off, the Oroya Exploration holds a 41⅔ per cent. interest. It has been decided to acquire the Queen of the Hills mine at Meekatharra (W.A.), where ore has been developed to the value of nearly £100,000 above the 160 ft. level, and the ore body has been cut in the shaft 62 ft. below that level, "showing good average values." In addition to its options on the Corinthian North and adjoining leases on the Yilgarn field, the company has a working option on the Transvaal mine on the same field. In Nicaragua also the Oroya Exploration has interests, the Babilonia gold mine near La Libertad being one. This has been worked under option, and the profit from ore treatment during the option period has covered the expense of development. The company has decided to acquire this property, and arrangements are being made to increase the plant. To acquire options and carry on work at various properties, and then, if it is deemed desirable, to purchase one or more outright, needs, of course, a good sum of money, but the Exploration directors state that the company's cash resources, together with the revenue from tailings remaining to be treated, will suffice. Other of the company's interests will probably be floated off sooner or later.

Lake Views have had a spurt, following the lead of Oroya Exploration. This is on account of the company being interested in the Mountain Queen mine, reference to which has been made above. Oroya Black Ranges have maintained their recent recovery, while Oroya Leonesa (a Nicaraguan proposition in which the Oroya Exploration holds shares) have revived, it being announced that development work is being resumed. A temporary cessation of dividends on the part of the Oroya Black Range is officially foreshadowed, as the company's resources are being employed in providing its share of the purchase price and of the cost of development of the Youanme properties.

Shareholders in the Northern Nigeria (Bauchi) Tin Mines have received during the past week quite a budget of information respecting their properties. It was time they were told what was being done, and now the management has broken silence I hope that it will see its way to keep the shareholders more regularly informed in future. The condition of the market in Bauchi shares has not been at all satisfactory of late, and doubtless some of my readers are disappointed, since I recommended the shares when they were above par. That there will be a recovery sooner or later, however, I feel confident, especially as the information which has just been officially issued confirms the view I have held for some time that the company has promising areas on the alluvial tin field. Mr. Laws, who is the chief mining engineer to the Niger Company, and has a unique experience of the field, has been appointed advisory engineer to the Bauchi, and it is stated that he considers the company's property "comprises one of the most important mining areas in Nigeria, and should supply large quantities of tin for many years to come." Having regard to the extent of the areas to be taken up, the chairman, in his circular, states that it will be necessary to form one or more subsidiary companies for the purpose, the first of which Mr. Laws thinks should be formed at once. As regards the winning of tin, ten tons were obtained during September, making a total of twenty-four tons since the company's staff took possession, and during the dry season now commencing an output of at least thirty tons a month is anticipated, providing the necessary labour can be obtained.

Gold Fields Report—Reduced Earnings, but Dividend Maintained—The Schedule of Shareholdings.

When the Gold Fields' dividend problem was discussed in Truth last month the opinion was expressed that the company's total earnings for the last financial year were probably less than for the preceding period, but it was also pointed out that reduced earnings did not necessarily mean that the distribution would be smaller. Shareholders in this important mining and financial undertaking are now in possession of the report of the directors, the contents of which bear out the views expressed in these columns a few weeks ago. The company's receipts are shown to have amounted to £1,046,747 in the twelve months ended June 30 last, as compared with £1,344,729 in the preceding financial year, but the return to holders of the ordinary shares is being brought up to 35 per cent. (7s. per share), the same rate as was paid in respect of 1908-9. When market men, some weeks ago, began to discuss the Gold Fields' dividend the question was not whether the amount would be larger, but whether there would be any reduction, so that the actual result announced last Thursday did not give rise to disappointment.

Although the Gold Fields' earnings last year were nearly £300,000 less than in 1908-9, the company's resources are not being strained by the maintenance of the ordinary dividend at 35 per cent. This is clearly demonstrated by the fact that the directors are allocating a sum of £200,000 to the writing down of the prices at which the shares in crushing mines stand in the company's books, while the carry-forward is £79,484 as against £71,083. Twelve months ago £500,000 was written off in the connection just referred to, so that in a couple of years the Gold Fields' has taken out of earnings £700,000 with which additional capital the directors have added new strings to the company's bow. Particulars of some of the new acquisitions are to be found in the schedule of investments given in the report.

This schedule of the Gold Fields' principal shareholdings is the first published since 1908, and will probably be studied with a good deal of interest by the majority of shareholders and by not a few who do not happen to be on the company's register. Space does not permit of a complete comparison of this schedule with the previous one, but a few features may be mentioned. One is that the Gold Fields' shareholdings in the Robinson Deep, Simmer and Jack, Simmer East, Simmer Deep, City Deep, and Van Ryn Deep have been reduced, as also has its interest in the Giant Mines of Rhodesia. On the other hand, the company has added to its Jupiter and Knight's Deep holdings, has increased the number of its Rhodesian and West African interests, has acquired shareholdings in a couple of Russian undertakings, and it has extended its operations in America. In their report the directors mention that they have made investments in electric power supply schemes, one such, in Iowa, having been taken up since the close of the past financial year. It has been reported quite recently that the Gold Fields has acquired the controlling interest in a property on the new Porcupine gold field in Ontario, Canada, but there is not mention of this in the report under review.

It would appear that during the last two years the Gold Fields' directors have been pursuing a policy of spreading the company's capital over a larger number of individual assets than heretofore, and that this policy has already been justified by results. Had the company's earnings been dependent to as large an extent as formerly upon Rand results and Kaffir market activity, the probability is that they would have shown a greater falling-off, and in the circumstances it is hardly to be wondered at that the report contains rather more than previous documents about Rhodesian mining affairs. At the end of June the Gold Fields still had a large holding (131,000 shares) in the Shamva Mines, and it has several Rhodesian properties under option. In Rhodesia, as in the Transvaal, however, there is a native labour difficulty to contend against. On the Rand this difficulty hampered the operations of the mines of the Gold Fields group during the last twelve months, and the directors observe that the supply still fails to keep pace with the demand, which, owing to the continued expansion of the mining industry, is largely in excess of the numbers available. At the Gold Fields crushing mines there have been changes in working methods in consequence of the labour shortage, but it remains to be seen whether these will produce the same profitable results as in the past.

INDUSTRIALS.

MAIKOP PROGRESS—PIPE LINE NEARLY COMPLETED—AUSTRALIAN BOUNTIES TO OIL PRODUCERS—FAVOURABLE NITRATE COMPANY RESULTS—CASTNER KELLNER ALKALI.

In the market for oil shares there has been little doing apart from Shell Transports. Judging from the large bull account carried over last week, the ability of the Shell Company to take care of itself against its American rival is looked upon with confidence. Exactly what is happening in connection with the rumoured oil war is a matter that is being kept very secret, but a section of the market was inclined to credit a story that the Shell and Standard Oil interests had come to an agreement in regard to the price of petrol. Anyhow, following the recent advance of a penny per gallon, the spirit has been further raised 1½d., thus restoring the quotation to the level at which it stood before the "cut" was made. There has been no revival of activity in Maikop descriptions, but it is good news to learn that the pipe line laid down by the Maikop Pipe Line and Transport Company is practically completed and will probably be in operation by the end of the year. A number of companies, including the Black Sea, Maikop Spies, and Maikop Oil and Petroleum Producers have already got beyond the boring stage, and are only waiting for pipe-line facilities to transport oil in considerable quantities from their reservoirs to the market. There are without doubt a number of Maikop companies that were floated in the boomlet which will never do any good for their shareholders. But a limited number, having the advantage of properties carefully selected by competent oil men, and burdened neither by excessive capitalisation nor heavy royalties, may be expected to yield good profits. I have hitherto picked out Maikop Spies, Anglo Maikops, Black Sea, Maikop Valley, Maikop and General Trust, and the Maikop Pipe Line and Transport as amongst the companies that start out as well equipped as any to achieve success, and adhere to this opinion, though it is necessary to add that nobody should touch oil shares unless he is willing to take a big risk.

The Commonwealth Oil Corporation has announced that the Bill providing for the payment of a bounty to the producers of kerosene and paraffin wax in Australia has now become law. An assurance has also been given that in addition to the bounty the Government during the present session will revise the tariff so as to include protection to the products of the corporation. This is good news for the Commonwealth, which claims to be at present the only producer of kerosene and paraffin wax in Australia. The company, indeed, can do with all the external aid there can be given; for owing to initial mistakes it is burdened with a very heavy capital. The policy of the Australian Government will also be heard with satisfaction by the British Australian Oil Company, which owns a New South Wales shale property that was publicly launched last March under the style of the Australian Oil Company. The British Australian Oil Company has a share capital of £300,000 in £1 shares. Its initial issue was 204,000 shares, of which the proceeds of £170,000 shares were to be used exclusively for the purpose of the company's business and working capital. There are no debentures or preference shares. According to the experts the company possesses a large and very rich property, which by means of a short tramway will be placed in direct communication with the Government main line to Newcastle. The profits to be realised upon the sale of paraffin wax, by-products, and export shale were estimated by Messrs. Ronald Johnstone and Son at £75,000 per annum, or 25 per cent. on the total capital. The prospectus added that it was a by no means unreasonable assumption that the Commonwealth Government may in the not distant future protect the shale industry in Australia, in which event the profits estimated would be correspondingly increased. As I have shown above, this assumption is now in process of becoming a fact.

The batch of reports issued in the last few days by nitrate companies make good reading. There has been no combination in force to restrict supplies since March, 1909, and the excellent results achieved under free production are most gratifying. The non-restriction of output has kept down the price of nitrate, and that has produced two important results. First it has forced upon the companies the need for rigid economy in working, and second it has greatly broadened consumption. I have heard it said of the farmer that once a user of nitrate he will never give it up, but the great difficulty has been to induce him to try it. Thus the increase in the demand may be regarded as a permanent increase, and while the question of a renewal of the combination amongst nitrate producers may be revived next June it is doubtful whether a return to the limitation of output policy will be found necessary. The Lagunas Syndicate in the past financial year earned gross profits of £125,500, an increase of £84,000 and net profits of £64,100, an advance of £54,000. The dividend is 6 per cent. against nil a year ago. The Liverpool Nitrate's gross profit of £54,500 goes against £18,900 in the previous year, and the net profit of £50,000 compares with a mere £2,600. The ordinary dividend is 56¼ per cent. as against 37½ per cent. for 1908-9 (paid mainly out of reserve), while the carry forward is £13,300 against £5,300. The Colorado, which is under the same control as the Liverpool, increased its trading profit last year by £7,500 to a total of £25,600, but as £12,000 was put aside for debenture redemption against nil, the dividend has just been maintained at 5 per cent. The London Nitrate Company has paid 20 per cent. against 10 per cent. a year ago, after putting £25,000, as against £5,000, to reserve, and carrying forward £10,914, as compared with £2,033.

The Castner Kellner Alkali Company appears to have benefited substantially from the improvement in the textile trades. It has announced a final dividend of 11¼ per cent., as compared with 9 per cent., making a total distribution for the year of 17½ per cent., as compared with 14 per cent. These results are of good augury for shareholders in similar concerns, amongst them the United Alkali Company, whose £10 ordinary and 7 per cent. preference shares I recommended on March 23 last. The preference shares can still be picked up at 12 or a fraction over; the ordinary now stand at 3 11-16, as compared with 3 when I drew attention to them. They are both still worth buying as speculative investments.

THE RUN ON THE BIRKBECK.

The sensational run on the Birkbeck Bank is the culmination of what appears to have been a carefully planned, long-continued, and malevolent attempt to bring that institution to grief. It is, at any rate, a fact that during the past year or so I have from time to time received anxious inquiries which seemed to indicate that vague but damaging rumours with reference to the bank were being circulated surreptitiously among the depositors. My invariable reply has been that I believed such rumours were entirely baseless. The recent failure of the Charing Cross Bank, which was not a bank at all in any legitimate sense of the term, gave some enemy of the Birkbeck an opportunity of dealing it a heavy blow. An anonymous letter was sent to depositors telling them that, through the Charing Cross failure, the Birkbeck was in low water, and the result was the remarkable rush to withdraw their money which the newspapers have described. The statement in the letter was an unmitigated lie, and I hope that the scoundrel who wrote it will be discovered and punished with the severity which such a piece of wickedness deserves. One obvious matter for investigation is the means by which the names and addresses of the depositors were obtained. Presumably this information must have been procured from someone inside the bank. Of course, the Birkbeck never had the remotest connection with the bankrupt Carpenter's so-called Charing Cross Bank, nor was there the faintest resemblance between the two businesses. Sensible people could easily have satisfied themselves on this point, and sensible people would, moreover, have recognised that, if the bank really was in low water, a run would wreck it altogether. But, as one sees every day, small investors as a class are not sensible people. They are mostly credulous fools, and so, like credulous fools, they swallowed the story in this anonymous letter, and took the course which the writer desired them to take. Some of the depositors who hurriedly got their money out of the Birkbeck were promptly relieved of it by pickpockets, and others have doubtless fallen into the hands of the horde of financial sharps who prey upon simpletons.

The Birkbeck Bank, which is really a branch of the Birkbeck Building Society, has been doing yeoman service in fostering thrift amongst the artisan and middle classes since 1851. According to its last balance-sheet, made up to March 31, it had against deposits of £10,784,324 no less than £8,740,000 in first-class securities, besides £1,069,753 in cash at bankers, £995,000 in money at call and short notice or advanced to customers. The other assets embraced mortgages and loans on real property, £726,000; ground rent and office buildings, £703,000; subscriptions just over £1,000,000; and a reserve of £431,000. These figures are sufficient to show the absurdity of the run that has been made in the last few days. As in 1892, when a previous run was made upon the Birkbeck, following upon the shock given to members of building societies generally by the Liberator crash, the management have been able to meet all demands made upon them without the slightest difficulty. The soundness of the position was such that the whole City banking world was prepared to see the Birkbeck through, and, as a matter of fact, the Bank of England itself readily advanced cash against securities, as it did in 1892. The outcome of the whole episode ought to be to place the Birkbeck more strongly in popular favour than ever.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Charing Cross Bank Trusteeship.

Whether it was an instance of cause and effect it is not for me to say, but I was interested to observe that two or three days after the appearance of the article on the Charing Cross Bank trusteeship in last week's Truth the Depositors' Protection Committee announced that they unanimously recommended Mr. Pixley to act as joint trustee with Mr. Moore, of the firm of Moore, Partridge and Co., the hon. secretaries to the committee. Nothing had been said about a second trustee in the previous unanimous recommendation of Mr. Moore, which was criticised in Truth, and the force of those criticisms is virtually admitted by this further proposal. Mr. Pixley is, of course, a chartered accountant whose great experience and high standing everyone recognises. Nevertheless, in view of the methods and proceedings of the self-appointed committee, I still think that depositors will be best advised to give their proxies to the Official Receiver, who will preside at the meeting next Monday, when the trustee will be appointed. Proxies already given to the committee should be withdrawn.

T. Morton Harris and Co.

In referring on November 2 to some bucket-shop keepers named T. Morton Harris and Co., of Victoria Buildings, Temple Row, Birmingham, I mentioned that they were circulating what purported to be a reprint of "An Interview with the Firm" from the Northern Standard of September 15. The editor of the Northern Standard of Monaghan—which, so far as I am aware, is the only paper bearing that title—now informs me that the alleged "interview" never appeared in any form in that journal, that he has never had any communication whatever with T. Morton Harris and Co., and that the latter's distribution of the bogus reprint is a matter upon which legal advice is being taken. I am glad to give publicity to this repudiation, and I trust that the proprietors of the Northern Standard will be able to bring this bucket-shop firm to book for their impudent misuse of the name of that paper.

Lennox and Co.

Here is a sample of the letters I am continually receiving from the victims of bucket-shop sharps:—

I have had a very unfortunate experience with Lennox and Co., 67, Leadenhall Street, E.C. I let them have £40 for investment on their system of operating. I got £5 in profits, and in September they sent a circular saying they were suspending profits for a short period. An inquiry made through an agent results in my being told there are no partners in the concern, but only a manager.

I am a working man, and shall be obliged for any information or advice. Is an action any good?

In common with a number of people this working man would have been saved from a "very unfortunate experience" if he had read and heeded the warnings against Lennox and Co. which I published when they opened their flat-trap. A fortnight ago I mentioned that a lady had obtained judgment against them for £132, and last week there was another judgment against them for £20. The defendants did not put in an appearance in either case, and proceedings against firms of this class generally mean nothing more than the throwing of good money after bad. No doubt it was the statement that they "guaranteed all the capital invested against loss" which was mainly instrumental in extracting cash from the pockets of their dupes. In reality, of course, any such "guarantee" in connection with speculations in stocks and shares is in itself a sufficient indication of the—well, irresponsible character of the firm giving it.

The Advantages of Life Assurance.

Mr. William Schooling writes about life assurance with a rare combination of knowledge and zeal. He is not only an expert but an enthusiast with a great admiration for the system of life assurance and a firm faith in its benefits. To show the infinitely varied ways in which the benefits of the system can be acquired is the object of his new book, "Practical Advice About Life Assurance" (Constable, 2s. 6d. net); and thanks to his happy gift for the clear exposition of abstruse principles and intricate calculations, the whole subject is made at once intelligible and interesting to any person of average understanding. It is a book which will serve a most useful purpose. Vast numbers of people are still ignorant of the facilities for sound and lucrative investment that are provided by means of different kinds of insurance policies, and a great many would certainly be far better off in the long run if they used their savings in that way instead of in buying stocks and shares.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Cura Peculi.—1. The Indian Railway stock is sound enough, and I do not think you ought to part with it. 2. The fall has occurred in sympathy with low interest-bearing stocks generally. If you were to sell, it would be difficult to find safer investments.

Rat.—Yes.

Jack Horner.—1. A further purchase might turn out all right in time. 2. All excellent. You might, perhaps, give the preference to F or A.

Mines.

B.—Some recovery will probably occur eventually, and I think you had better hold. Begonia.—1 and 2. Hold. 3. A small dividend may be announced next month. 4 and 5. Very much of a gamble at present price.

Christmas Daisy.—Holding must be considered very much of a speculation.

E. J.—I have not a good opinion of them. Elmer.—The mining shares you mention are a fair speculative holding for dividends, but they do not appear particularly cheap at the present price.

Glencairn.—I would hold rather than realise at the present low price, but would put the additional money into something else, so as to spread the risk.

Hermit.—Hold for a better market. Hew.—1. The company went into liquidation several years ago. 2. Price about 3s. 6d. Might be held as a speculation in hope of recovery when the market recovers. 3. If you mean "Sinti Reef" the price is about 4s. 6d. I have not a high opinion of them. Halley's Comet.—Hold as a speculation in hope of some eventual recovery.

Moss Park.—Hold for some eventual recovery.

Shrapnel Shell.—A rather speculative lot, and I see no reason to expect much early advance in any of them. Stony.—The company went into liquidation in December, 1907, and your scrip is valueless.

Tar.—Prospects are uncertain. The shares may, however, be given a run in the market later on. Thomas.—The shares seem a hopeful holding, but all such enterprises are, of course, speculative. Perhaps the secretary would explain the apparent discrepancy you refer to if you sent him your figures.

Waterloo.—Unless prepared to lock the shares away as a speculation, in the hope that something will eventually be done with the property, it would seem as well to accept the present price. William.—I am not recommending any such shares at present. "Low-priced" and "cheap" are not synonymous terms.

Yock.—I do not care to recommend a purchase.

Mixed Securities.

Antares.—1. I retain my previously expressed poor opinion of these shares, and would sell. 2. I think you could make a better selection in the same group. Autumn.—1. You might purchase the Japanese 4½ per Cents. 2. Dividends paid January and July. Last ex div. on July 14. 3. Just so. It ranks after the debenture stocks of the Interoceanic. 4. Published weekly, usually in Wednesday's papers. Aster.—Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per Cent. Debenture stock, Royal Mail Steamship 5 per Cent. Debenture stock, and Goldsbrough Mort. 5 per Cent. "B" Debenture stock. Ailsa Craig.—a. The rubbers are both good holdings. Better hold the Iron shares. b. Between 10 and 11 per cent. They are not particularly cheap. c. Mathieson's Handbook for Investors, 2s. 6d., 16, Copthall Avenue, E.C. d. It would be hard to obtain a better yield with the same security. I think you ought to keep the stock.

Cricklite.—Nos. 1 and 2 each entail a fair amount of risk. They are quoted at 86¾-7⅞, and 95-96 respectively. No. 2 is a fair commercial holding. The price is 1⅛. Cuckoo.—1. A first-class investment. 2. I do not care for these. Cicestrian.—1. Better sell. 2. I should be inclined to realise on a small recovery. Cruiser.—See reply to "Acid," under "Rubber." The share is more suitable for speculation in active markets than for investment at the moment.

Fusilier.—Presumably fresh coupons will be supplied, for it is unlikely that the bonds will all be redeemed by 1917.

Hopeful.—1. There are, so far as I am aware, no dealings in the bonds, and I can only suggest that you get your broker to make inquiry through his New York agent. 2 and 3. Both poor holdings, and it is impossible for me to predict a resumption of dividends on either. Hopeful.—1. I see no reason to expect much recovery, and think you had better exchange into something else. 2. I advised their sale at double the price you gave. Having them still, you might as well hang on in hopes of a rally later. 3. I do not recommend you to buy. The company, so far as I am aware, has no office in this country. It is a Canadian company, with headquarters in Montreal.

Pat.—You have three excellent holdings and should retain them.

Senex.—1. A good investment, and worth holding. 2. Under good auspices, but position still clouded by the oil war in Mexico. As regards the others, please read Rule 2.

Tan.—You were answered last week, my recommendation being Kansas City Terminals 4 per Cent. Bonds. I gave a list of other good bonds, with details, in an article of October 26; the names were Central Pacific Through Short Line 4 per Cent. 1st Mortgage Bonds, Atchison 4 per Cent. "A" Adjustments, Baltimore and Ohio (Pittsburg, Lake Erie, and West Virginia) Fours, and Chicago, Milwaukee Fours. I might further add Union Pacific 1st Lien and Refunding Sterling Fours.

Verona.—Keep them. The fall has pretty well run its course by now.

W. R. T.—1. New York Telephone 4½ per Cent. Bonds and Kansas City Terminals 4 per Cent. Bonds. 2. One very desirable form of investment. 3. At present, ⅞ to 1. I should be inclined to realise. Which.—1. Judging by the names on the Board, it is a thoroughly responsible concern, and you need have little hesitation in transacting business with it. 2. Canadian Municipal bonds, as a body, yield less than 4 per cent. 3. Yes. 4 and 5. Doubtless good enough, but neither is quoted on this side. Workman.—The money is absolutely safe where it is, and I would not disturb it.

Rubber.

Acid.—London Ventures are a good speculative holding, but until promotion business revives the company cannot make any heavy profit. It has, I understand, some good business in hand, but I cannot forecast dividend. A. A. A.—Your Malaccas should eventually shot you a profit if you average as you suggest. When Linggis go over 50s. write to me again, and I will suggest a cheaper share. ALBANA.—1. A first-class holding for good dividends, but I do not look for much appreciation unless the price of rubber materially improves. If you desire capital appreciation combined with dividends exchange for Tremelbye. 2 Travancore Rubbers are sound, and may be held for some time. They should show you a good profit. See third reply to "Culling." AGO.—1. There is a promise of some activity in Jequié. Hold for the present. 2. See third reply to "Chuncut." 3. They are high enough. 4. Ceylon Timber and Rubber, Tempeh, Taiping. ALBERTA.—Among Ceylon tea and rubbers, Northumberland and Doranakande are sound cheap shares. ARIES.—1. See third reply to "Robusta." I do not expect the shares to touch your limit in the immediate future, but I look for a substantial recovery. 2. I agree. Write then, and I will suggest an exchange.

BLEATER.—The number of trees on the company's estate (1,500,000) is very large compared with the small capital of £20,000. A promising gamble. BLACKFRIARS.—Financial Times, Saturday edition. BULGER.—1. There is some doubt as to the suitability of the soil in the case of a, but the others are good for capital appreciation. 2. Worth averaging at present price, but the company has probably lost £60,000 by depreciation of its original holdings, and I do not expect an early dividend. 3. Cannot fix limits at present. BROWNE.—The last three should steadily appreciate and show you a profit. Write again as to Crudes after the demonstration to shareholders. BIRCHWEST.—1. A very good speculative chance. 2. The purchase price was excessive. Sell at any profit. 3. In my opinion the Guayule dividend cannot be maintained for long. I criticised the issue severely on flotation, and at the present discount the shares are still unattractive. BELGRAVIA.—Sempah is worth holding for a substantial profit. BREEZEUPPE.—1. See reply to "Spyker." 2. I think so. 3. See reply to "Lea." 4. £300,000 issued in fully paid shares in payment of purchase price. BRADAN.—1. See reply to "Acid." Hold. 2. Should develop rapidly next year. 3. See reply to "Threequid." 4. See third reply to "Chuncut." BANDOOM.—See reply to "Subscriber." 1. Yes. 2. See reply to "Lea" and third reply "Zinc." 3. The working capital is, I believe, sufficient. 4. See reply to "Threequid."

CULLING.—1. Kuala Lumpur is an exceptionally heavy yielder, but its acreage valuation is very high. Market opinion favours a rise in the shares, but if they approach 10 write to me, and I will suggest an exchange for a cheaper share. 2. Well worth holding. 3. My correspondent speaks well of Periyar, but the market is restricted to Colombo. Travancore Rubber Company shares are officially quoted in Edinburgh, and might suit you better. Tapping has commenced on 10,000 trees, and next year 90,000 trees will be tappable. The growth in this district is not so rapid as in Malaya, but the shares are undervalued. I agree as to Rani. CICESTRIAN.—Sell on a small recovery. There are other shares which have better permanent prospects. COT.—Kajang prospectus estimates to May 31, 1911, 9,300 lbs.; 1912, 27,000 lbs.; 1913, 55,300 lbs.; 1914, 89,400 lbs.; 1915, 135,400 lbs. Tebrau is now tapping, and should earn a dividend for the year 1911-12. CONSTANT READER.—Sell No. 1 at 30s., if it shows you a profit. Hold Nos. 2, 3, and 4. As to No. 5, see Rule 2. CASA.—I prefer Strathmore and Glen Bervie. CHUNCUT.—1. Speculative, but I look for an improvement. 2. Worth holding for a profit. 3. In good hands, but the property is developing slowly, and an exchange for Taiping would probably give quicker results. CHUN.—1. A good company of its type, but the Malayan companies are less speculative. 2. The October return is disappointing, but it is, I understand, only a temporary reduction. 3. The cost of production seems high. Do as you suggest. Buy Tremelbye and Strathmore. CRASTUS.—As to No. 1, see third reply to "Robusta," and reply to "Threequid." Hold this, but sell Nos. 2 and 3 on any improvement. CARLTON.—The Rubana premium was described in these columns as excessive. Most of the shares were kept by the promoters. Worth holding at present price. CUSH.—1. Taiping. 2. See third reply to "Chuncut."

DOOLGALLA.—1. The shares are cheap, but the growth is not so forward as in Malaya, and the scale does not apply. 2. Good Ceylon companies. DALMON.—The commission charged is double the ordinary rate, and I think you might complain. D. D.—I have dealt with your point in my Notes.

ELASTIC.—1. When Linggi touches 50s., write to me again, and I will suggest an exchange for a cheaper share. 2. Worth holding. ETA.—1. Instead of averaging, buy Tremelbye. 2. See reply to "Browne." ECONET.—Hold for the present. See reply to "Acid."

EUREKA.—Cut the loss at ½ discount. Buy Taiping. FIFER.—1. I have never before heard of this publication, but the fact that it is given away is a pretty good indication of its value as a financial guide. 2. A poor concern. Exchange for Taiping. 3. Glen Kee tapping commences 1911. FESTINA LENTE.—1. See reply to "Spyker." The share, of course, is speculative, but I think it would be wise to average now. The company expects to earn a dividend next year. 2. The company is in good hands, but development is slow. Instead of averaging, buy Taiping. 3. Stick to your inside brokers. 4. The operation would be too speculative for the amateur. FELICITAS.—Hold Nos. 1, 2, 5, and 6 for steady appreciation. Take a profit when you see one on No. 3. Exchange No. 4 for Tremelbye.

GEM.—A sound investment. Hold. GLYME.—Ventures are a good speculative holding, and seem likely to improve. Northumberlands are a good purchase at present price. As to the other inquiry, see reply to "Elmer," under Mines. GOOLS.—1. Not recommended. 2. A sound share. Worth buying at present price. GLOSTER.—Watch for an opportunity to sell. The company was criticised in these columns on flotation. GOLOSHES.—Never before heard of him or the publication whose value is indicated by the fact that it is given away.

HOPEFUL.—1. Hold Ledbury for a higher price. 2. Soundly managed, but the company cannot have made much money of late. Hold the shares, but do not average at present. 3. Worth holding for a profit. Coffee now producing, but no rubber before 1912. HARTFELL (Moffat).—Frequently criticised in these columns. Cut the loss. HOMER.—Hold both for recovery. They are speculative, but the Crude position will be explained at the forthcoming demonstration to shareholders. Nyassa should develop rapidly next year. HOLY CROSS.—Three sound shares which you may safely hold for steady improvement. No dividends have yet been paid, but No. 2 is now tapping. JACK.—Tremelbye, Strathmore, and Taiping. J. M. B.—A good Borneo planting proposition, fairly valued at present price. JAB.—1. All good. 2. Bandar Sumatra. J. S. (Newtownards).—1. The purchase price was excessive, and I do not recommend the investment. 2. Deal only through Stock Exchange members.

LEA.—1. The shares have good speculative possibilities, and, although for investment purposes I should prefer a Malayan share I should not sell at present price. The quotation you mention does not refer to the company's shipments, but I have no detailed information as to the profit made on the cleaned rubber. All the machines are being refitted with the new boilers. See first reply to "Festina Lente." 2. A call is now pending. Hold. See third reply to "Zinc." LIMPET.—I have repeatedly expressed an unfavourable opinion of this company, which was grossly overcapitalised. Cut the loss. LEDI.—The shares are speculative, but you might average at present price. See reply to "Threequid," and third reply to "Robusta." MAGNUS.—Average as you suggest. MOB.—Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 should take care of themselves in your absence abroad, but Nos. 1 and 2 are more speculative, and you might leave limits with your broker of ½ premium for No. 1 and 1½ for No. 2. The usual course is to leave the certificates and transfers (signed in blank) with your bankers, and to arrange for them to deliver to the broker against contract note and cheque. Many thanks for your contributions to the TRUTH Toy Fund and the Tress-Barry Fund. MELL.—Nos. 1 and 4. Also Strathmore. MASR (Cairo).—All worth holding. Sekong is 12s. 6d. paid and Rani 7s. 6d. paid. The Financier Rubber Share Handbook should suit you.

NAP.—1. The board is respectable, but I have no confidence in the venture, and am afraid you will get nothing out of it but disappointment. 2. Strathmore. NEKO.—Bandjarsarie, Langkat Sumatra, and Glen Bervie should suit you. NOWGONG.—Juru has a strong board, and the shares under par are worth locking up. Lanadron is first-class, and Highlands is a sound investment share. NOMAD.—See Rule 3.

ORIENT.—No. 1 is a safe holding for steady improvement. Nos. 2 and 3 are more speculative. Hold both for higher prices.

PINNER.—A promising speculation. PASSE.—Hold Beverley. PLUG.—Sell No. 1. Average No. 2. PAX.—Average now, as you suggest.

RANI.—They are speculative, of course, but I expect to see them touch higher prices. RODDY.—Difficult to say. At least they should make a good recovery. ROBUSTA.—1 and 2. Yes. They should yield you an average of 10 per cent. for seven years. 3. The prospectus estimate was 25 per cent., and I know of no reason why the company should not earn this, and in time exceed it. 4. Very speculative. Prospects depend entirely upon management. 5. Worth locking up at present price. 6. Yes. Not an unreasonable figure. R. W. L.—The company was grossly over-capitalised, and I have no confidence in its success. Instead of averaging buy Strathmore. RAX.—1. Quite good, and likely to go higher. 2. Cannot fix limit at present. 3. A local company, as to which I cannot advise. RUSSELL.—There is a reasonable chance of Nos. 1, 2, and 3 reaching your figures, but when No. 1 touches 50s. write to me again, and I will suggest an exchange for a cheaper share. RICE.—Both very fair holdings. Take any reasonable profit and exchange for Malayan shares. RALPH.—His remarks are not worth notice.

SHANGHAI.—The company is quite sound, but Tremelbye and Strathmore are at the moment better purchases. The valuation scale was published in TRUTH on October 19 (page 957). STRATHBLANE.—Strathmore is quoted daily in the Financier. SEMPER VIGILANS.—1. Both good purchases, but Tremelbye and Strathmore are relatively cheaper. 2. There is not much room for appreciation to your figure. 3. It is a bucket-shop publication, which was dealt with in TRUTH some time ago. SPYKER.—The Madagascar shipments to date exceed 100,000 lbs., but they have consisted largely of rubber, purchased and cleaned. Extracted rubber is expected now to come forward in good quantity, and a circular explaining the position is about to be issued. STOURTON.—Good shares, but Tremelbye, Strathmore, and Langkat Sumatra would suit you better. SNAVE.—1. You are quite right. The output to September 30 was 5,495 lbs. October output, 1,654 lbs. 2. Exact data not available, but, say, between 6s. and 7s. SUBSCRIBER.—They are all worth holding at present, and I look for some improvement in the Venture group. You hold, however, too many speculative shares. After some recovery has taken place write to me again, quoting prices paid, and I will suggest some exchanges.

THREEQUID.—The company, I understand, last week sold some of its washed rubber at a price exceeding that of fine hard Para. Write again after the demonstration to shareholders. TRUSTFUL.—Nos. 1, 3, and 6 are worth holding for a profit. Sell No. 2 on any recovery. Exchange No. 5 for Taiping. TWENTYTIMES.—1. See reply to "Threequid," and third reply to "Robusta." 2.

Date not yet fixed. 3. Yes. 4. Public sentiment accounts for a good deal. 5. Too optimistic.

UNCAS.—All worth holding for dividends and improvement.

VEXATUS.—All good for a substantial advance in any revival. Nos. 1 and 4 seem likely to move as you suggest, and I look for a steady improvement in No. 2. As to No. 3, see reply to "Lea." I appreciate your remarks.

ZEBRA.—1. A good Borneo planting proposition, but you paid a heavy premium, which is not likely to be recovered for some time to come. 2. Yes. Asiatics are a good purchase. 3. Yes. Malaccas should be good for steady improvement. ZINC.—1. Since the spring the outlook for rubber shares generally has, of course, changed, and I would not now adhere to my selling limits, nor can I suggest a revised limit at present. 2. I regard the shares as a good purchase. 3. Yes. Vine and Generals are a promising speculation. I understand that the company is negotiating for a reduction in the purchase price of the patents. 4. I think so.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A. B. K.—There may be sufficient security for the smaller amount it is now proposed to lend, but I do not see any particular attraction about the debentures. AYTON.—In certain quarters the outlook for the concern is regarded very confidently, but the estimates have yet to bear the commercial test, and I should not care to recommend the shares except as a gamble. ALEX.—1. If I were not by now schooled in the knowledge that there are still plenty of people who will swallow anything they see in print I should refuse to believe that it could pay any firm to issue such circulars. 2. Do not buy more. A NERVOUS ONE.—A bucket-shop dodge exposed in TRUTH last week. APEX.—1. No. The publication you name is run by the firm whose advertisement appears in it. 2. I know of none who would do so, but take my advice and avoid dealings with bucket-shop concerns—unless you want to burn your fingers.

CLEMDAW.—I have a very poor opinion of the concern, and doubt whether you could sell if you wished. CARLTON.—1. Worth holding. No. 3 looks all right, but without knowing more about local conditions governing the trade it would hardly be wise to buy. CHINSURAH.—I only know that many of these lottery touts are unprincipled tricksters. Dealings in the tickets are illegal here, and people who choose to buy in spite of the law have to take the risk of being cheated. 2. They charge exceedingly exorbitant prices for such bonds. Let your friend ask them to buy the bonds back, and then she will see how much she has lost. C. W. D.—A newly established concern which I have so far had no reason to criticise, though I do not recommend it.

D. F. R. C.—1. I recommended them in an article several weeks ago. 2. I do not care to recommend them. DELTA.—They are not quoted in the Official List, and I have heard no price mentioned. D. F. (Merthyr Tydfil).—Write for prospectuses to the Birkbeck Bank, Southampton Buildings, Holborn, and the National Freehold Land and Building Society, 25, Moorgate Street, E.C.

FACTS.—The other two were Lagunas Syndicate and Liverpool. FULHAM.—Sell.

GEO.—I. It is an unfortunate investment, but burning the certificates will not relieve you of liability for the further calls if the company choose to sue. 2. I believe it is a satisfactory society.

HAD.—I am afraid they are a poor holding. You might by waiting get a rather better price than the present, but better not buy more.

INQUISITIVE.—I am not in a position to say whether the method is a common one. Its safety in your case apparently depends upon the stability of the local broker.

JAMES.—There is no market for the shares, and you had better leave them alone. JUMPY.—I know no reason to doubt the official explanation, and should retain the shares. JOYCE.—My opinion is unfavourable; and sooner or later it is pretty certain to be prosecuted under the Lotteries Act.

KIM.—I know of no reason why such an option should become valuable in three months. KILWHELAN.—If the original company was wound up you have no claim, and in any case after the lapse of several years it would not be worth while to take proceedings over so small a sum.

LEA.—1. Fairly well secured, but I should hesitate to say safe. Better not buy more of 2 or 3.

MRS. GRUNDY.—Duncan, Forbes and Co. are bucket-shop keepers whom you should shun. MONS.—The firms you name are not by any means of the same class as McKinley, Alexander and Sons, but they are bucket-shop keepers nevertheless, and making their own gains mainly out of the losses of their customers.

NIWDEM.—I am afraid the outlook for shareholders is practically hopeless.

OSWALD.—I fear it would be throwing good money after bad to sue them. See Note in another column. OUTBRAVING.—I do not advise dealing with any outside firm. Do your business through a broker who is a member of the Stock Exchange.

PREMIER.—The low price hardly suggests great confidence in the concern. Better not buy more. PEPPIE.—1. A very fair industrial. 2. Well secured. 3. All London bank shares have fallen in the last few years along with high-class investments generally. But the quality of your investment remains as good as ever.

REKLAW.—I know nothing against the firm, but cannot take responsibility for recommending it.

SYRENE.—No. 3 is distinctly speculative; the other two are fair industrials, liable to a good deal of fluctuation in dividends and prices. SMALLMAN.—No. 1 is the best. S. G. C. (Bournemouth).—A tip-top investment. You need have no hesitation about adding to your holding. SOCRATES.—See Note in another column. SCOT.—Yes, it is remarkable, but perhaps he will yet be prosecuted. The law here moves very slowly.

INSURANCE.

MY usual article under this heading is unavoidably held over, but I give below replies to a number of inquiries. Correspondents making such inquiries should send with their letters a coupon cut from the third page of the cover of TRUTH.

Pedro.—All the four companies you mention are entirely first class; all you need consider is which gives the best terms in your case. Sugden (Hazel Grove).—I think you can do better for annuities than the company whose advertisement you refer to. Napier.—You are most likely to obtain what you want from the General Accident Fire and Life Insurance Company of Perth and of King Street, Cheapside. College.—I know nothing about the insurance agent whose circular you send me, but the policy he recommends is perfectly safe, though I think better results can be obtained elsewhere. S. A. (Perrins Court).—Have nothing whatever to do with the corporation whose papers you sent me. Advance.—I suppose I must consider the company well-intentioned, and not a conscious swindle. The various companies whose names have appeared on their stationery are all tenth-rate, and if you cannot obtain a surrender value I should advise you to cut your loss, and in any case pay no more. Teacher.—I think the scheme of which you send details is genuine, mainly because the consulting actuary is a good man, but you would do far better with the Clerical, Medical and General. William.—I am sorry to say so, but I am very much afraid your best plan is to pay no more, even though it involves the loss of the money you have paid. W. M.—(1) The company you mention is quite sound and reliable, but (2) the United Kingdom Temperance is better. J. J. (W. B.).—So many companies are absolutely safe, that I cannot mention one as being the safest. For your purpose you will do exceedingly well either with the Scottish Widows Fund or the Clerical, Medical and General. Assaigne.—I have not much information about the Bombay company you mention, but I have always understood that it is thoroughly sound and good. As regards the English company you name, it is safe and respectable, but I have no great belief in its long-continued prosperity. Assurance (Swansea).—The society in which your friend is insured is quite safe, and for his purpose good. Z. S. R.—The society you mention is in many ways excellent, but not very happily placed for discounted bonus purposes. I should recommend the Scottish Amicable, or the Clerical, Medical and General in preference Bymbol.—You would do better to continue your policy in the Standard, in spite of the fact that no bonus was declared at the last valuation. You will probably receive a bonus next time, and in any case you would only lose by changing. J. C. (Larne).—Have nothing whatever to do with the corporation you mention, either as agent or policyholder. Irishman Determined.—I do not know exactly how the matter stands in regard to the legal proceedings which you mention. I can understand and sympathise with, your desire to call a mass meeting, but I am rather afraid it would cost you time and money and not benefit you in the long run.

SPECIAL LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

No. 1768. WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1910.

MR. ROOSEVELT AS SPORTSMAN.

"African Game Trails." By Theodore Roosevelt. With Illustrations from Photographs by Kermit Roosevelt, and from Drawings by Philip R. Goodwin. (London : John Murray. 18s. net.)

COLONEL ROOSEVELT'S "African Game Trails," incomparably the most thrilling record of lion, leopard, elephant, and buffalo stalking which has appeared for a generation, has for one of its mottoes, from the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, "He loved the big game as if he were their father." Colonel Roosevelt's love is akin to that Izaac Walton advised the fisherman to show to the frog he impaled on his hook—that he might live the longer as a bait. But if Colonel Roosevelt's love is that of a sportsman, it is that of a true sportsman, who never slaughters for slaughter's sake. Even his son, Kermit, who as a mere lad of nineteen, would naturally forget every other consideration in his eagerness to make as big a bag as possible, is quixotic in his chivalry towards lions! He and a fellow-sportsman, named Tarlton, ran unexpectedly into a group of eleven lions—a male, three females, and seven cubs, some of them half-grown. They contrived to get between the lion and the three lionesses and seven cubs when the husband and father turned savagely to bay:—

> Kermit, whose horse had once fallen with him in the chase, and Tarlton leaped off their horses, and Kermit hit the lion with his first shot, and as it started to charge mortally wounded it with a second bullet. It turned and tried to reach cover, and Tarlton stopped it with a third shot, for there was no time to lose, as they wished to attack the other lions. After a sharp gallop they rounded up the lionesses and cubs. Kermit killed one large cub, which they mistook for a lioness; wounded a lioness, which for the time being escaped, killed another with a single bullet, and hit the third as she crouched facing him at two hundred yards. She at once came on at full speed, making a most determined charge, coming on with great bounds so that Kermit missed her twice, but broke her shoulder high up when she was but thirty yards off. She fell on her head, and on rising galloped, not at the men, but at the horses, who, curiously enough, paid no heed to her. Tarlton stopped her with a bullet in the nick of time, just before she reached them, and with another bullet Kermit killed her. Two days later they came upon the remaining cubs and the wounded lioness, and Kermit killed the latter, but let the cubs go, feeling it unsportsmanlike to kill them.

This love of Kermit's "for the big game, as if he were their father," left out of account that charity which begins at home, since these creatures are often man-eaters by preference and, on occasion, man-killers. "At one dinner my host and two of my fellow-guests had been within a year or eighteen months severely mauled by lions." At another dinner at the Mombasa Club the Colonel met a German who had with an Italian friend and an English railway official run down in a special car to try to kill a man-eater which had carried away several people from a station on the line. They ran the car into a siding, leaving the door open (as it was hot), and the Englishman on the watch for the lion. While the Italian lay on the floor of the car and the German in an upper bunk, the Englishman sat intermediately at the open window to watch for the lion. But he fell asleep, and the lion, who was also on the watch for him, entered the car, and, standing with his hind feet on the Italian, and resting his forepaws on the seat, killed the Englishman. "The German, my informant, hearing the disturbance, leaped out of his bunk actually on the back of the lion, which, however, occupied only with his prey, held the Englishman's body in his mouth, forced his way out through the window-sash, and made his meal undisturbed but a couple of hundred yards from the railway carriage." By the way, I find that all those that Colonel Roosevelt met who had been mauled by lions assured him that the mauling gave them at the time no pain whatsoever. That, too, I remember was Livingstone's experience, and, indeed, it was also the experience of a brother of mine who was cruelly mangled and lamed for life by a Bengal tiger. This suggests that "Nature red in tooth and claw with ravine" may not be as cruel as she seems to be, a comforting suggestion which is strengthened by Colonel Roosevelt's testimony to the amazing suddenness of the recovery from panic of creatures that have but just escaped from a horrible death. The impression this fascinating book leaves upon you is that of a man of extraordinary strength of character and of purpose and of a humanity—both to man and beast—no less admirable. As a man who has risked his life more often, perhaps, than any other hunter that has spent so short a time in the country, his opinion of the relative formidableness of his quarries will have weight. He agrees with Selous, who has killed near four hundred lions, elephants, buffaloes, and rhinos, that the lion is the most dangerous of all. On the other hand, Drummond ranks the rhino as the most formidable, Baker the elephant, and Governor Jackson the buffalo. But doctors are not the only fallible experts.

For years many and experienced African hunters have differentiated the black rhino into two species—one with the front horn longer than the rear one, and the other with the two horns of equal length—the former as ferocious a creature as the latter was inoffensive. Yet there is now no doubt at all that "the two species" are identical! By the way, Colonel Roosevelt himself surely makes a slip in asserting "that the African elephant has never, like his Indian kinsman, been trained to man's use." What of the war elephants of Carthage and Hannibal? They were unquestionably African. You are not allowed to forget in this delightful book, since Colonel Roosevelt never allowed himself to forget it, that the expedition he headed was primarily scientific in its object. Indeed, you have only to read Appendix E., the colonel's paper upon protective colouration, written in refutation of Mr. Thayer's extravagant contention "that all patterns and colours whatsoever of all animals that prey or are preyed on are under certain normal circumstances obliterative"—you have but to read this clear, cumulative and crushing refutation to feel sure that the colonel would have made his mark as a man of science if sport and politics had not diverted his acuteness of observation and inference into other channels.

HEINE AND BYRON.

"Heinrich Heine's Memoirs." From his Works, Letters, and Conversations. Edited by Gustav Karpeles. English Translation by Gilbert Cannan. With Portraits. 2 Vols. (London : William Heinemann. 12s. net.)

"The Love Affairs of Lord Byron." By Francis Gribble. (London : Eveleigh Nash. 15s. net.)

The translation by Mr. Gilbert Cannan of Gustav Karpeles' "Heinrich Heine's Memoirs" is well done and welcome, but would be more welcome if a biography or biographical notes had been supplied in explanation of allusions which must occasionally be obscure even to students of Heine's life and works. To be sure, the translations of Heine's verses in the volumes are bald to banality, but who has ever succeeded in an adequate rendering in any language of Heine's exquisite lyrics? You get but the drops of water on which the rainbow was painted. The publisher in his preface wonders why the earlier version given to the world twenty years ago found no English translator; but Heine, I fancy, is caviare to the general in England, he being, in fact, incomparably more French in his esprit than British. Indeed, the lack of sympathy is mutual. "No! never let me return to that abominable country," he exclaims of England, "where the machines conduct themselves like men and the men like machines. The noise of the former and the silence of the latter are equally insupportable." And this of London! What would he have said if he had gone north, where the machines are numberless and deafening, and where the entire morning conversation of two merchants on 'Change is usually, as Punch fairly reports it:—"Mornin'!" "Mornin'!" "Ought?" "Nought." "Mornin'!" "Mornin'!"

But it must never be forgotten that Heine's views, whether of England or of Germany, were always more or less sicklied o'er with the pale cast of an embittered mind in a diseased body. "I am on good terms with my family," he writes to one of his dearest friends. "I am the only member of it with whom I stand ill." The line in "The Traveller" describing France as "pleased with thyself, whom all the world can please," is the secret of amiability, and its reverse of misanthropy, which might fairly be defined in Heine's words as "standing ill with oneself," and therefore out of patience with the whole world. But besides a jaundiced mind in a diseased body, Heine had to envenom his anti-German malignity all the persecution—very bitter in that day and country—which he had to endure as a Jew from Christians, and as a revolutionist from Governments. It was, of course, a vicious circle, and the more brutally Heine was bludgeoned the more venomously he wielded in defence and offence his exquisitely tempered and sharpened rapier; but even when driven from Germany he loved the Fatherland, and loved it all the more through the exile to which it condemned him. The truth is that Heine, in spite of his cynicism, was no cynic, was the reverse of a cynic—an enthusiast—and of the many glimpses he gives you of himself in these introspective letters, the most faithful is not his comparison of himself with Byron, but his contrast between himself and Goethe. "Byron's death," he writes, "has moved me much. He was the only man to whom I felt myself akin, and we were alike in many things. I have always been glad of his company as that of a thorough comrade in arms and an equal." But Byron's was a shallow nature compared with Heine's. On the other hand, Heine does himself more justice in the following contrast he draws between himself and Goethe:—

> Goethe and I are fundamentally of such a nature that from our very heterogeneity we must repel each other. He is essentially an easy-living man for whom the joy of life is the highest, one who feels life for and in the idea of it, has a sort of foreshadowing of it and expresses it in poems, but has never laid a firm hand on it, and still less has lived it. I, on the other hand, am essentially an enthusiast—that is, one who is inspired with an idea even to the point of sacrifice—and I am always forced to lose myself in it. But, on the other hand, I have seized firmly the joy of life and the delight of it, and now there is in me the great struggle between my clear reason, which sanctions the joy of living and denies all sacrifice in inspiration or folly, and my enthusiastic tendency, which often leaps up in me, inundates and takes possession of me. . . . It is still a great question whether the enthusiast who gives even his life for his idea does not live more and more happily than Herr von Goethe in all his six-and-seventy years of egoism and comfort.

But to be such an enthusiast you must be what Goethe certainly was not—a one-sided man. "To do anything," writes Heine in a letter to Moses Moser, "a man must be one-sided." A man who sees all sides takes none. Heine, who was above all things a poet and a lyric poet, did not look down, like Goethe, from the chill heights of philosophy and see all things by the "dry light" of Heraclitus. Even in these fascinating letters the lyric poet is more in evidence than the philosopher.

I doubt that Heine, if he had read Mr. Francis Gribble's "The Love Affairs of Lord Byron," would still, in spite of his own many amours, claim kinship to his lordship. In Heine's affairs of this kind there was often poetry and always sentiment to redeem the animality of the amours, but you cannot say of most of Byron's intrigues that "vice itself lost half its evil by losing all its grossness." Shelley, who admired Byron as the greatest poet of his generation and loved him as a devoted friend, expresses extreme disgust at his intrigues with Italian women, "the most contemptible of all who live under the moon."—If, however, even Mr. Gribble cannot etherealise Byron's love affairs, he has at least not scotched merely, but killed beyond all hope of resurrection the filthy invention of Lady Byron, Mrs. Beecher Stowe, and Lord Lovelace. Indeed, he leaves you in no doubt that the pharisaic Lady Byron herself could not and did not believe the abominable slander at the time she alleged it. The letters she then wrote to Mrs. Leigh put this beyond all doubt. Here is one:—"My dearest A,—It is my great comfort that you are in Piccadilly"—i.e., in the house with Lord Byron! Mr. Gribble, while dismissing as incredible Mr. Richard Edgcumbe's suggestion, made in "Byron: The Last Phase," that Medora Leigh was the child of Mary Chaworth, whom Mrs. Leigh adopted and pretended to be her own, yet leaves you in little doubt that the illicit intrigue with Mary was a fact and the inspiration of some of the poet's most passionate poems.

A FASCINATING AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

"Yvette Guilbert: Struggles and Victories." By Yvette Guilbert and Harold Simpson. Illustrated. (London: Mills and Boon, Limited. 10s. 6d. net.)

No one can read Yvette Guilbert's "Struggles and Victories"—the really poignant story of her early privations and humiliations, forlorn efforts and failures, hopes deferred that made the heart sick, disappointed hopes that embittered the heart without a haunting sense that in her precarious profession these "struggles" are the rule and these "victories" the exception. Yvette Guilbert opens her fragment of an autobiography with a doubly underlined dedication, "A Dieu, d'abord!" as the power which alone had saved her from final submergence in those deep waters where no ground was in which she had so often sunk; but I could not help recalling, as I read this devout dedication, the answer of Diagoras to the worshipper of Neptune who showed him in the temple of that god the votive pictures of those that had been saved from drowning by a prayer to him in their extremity:—"Yes; but where are they painted that were drowned?" Of the thousands who have "gone under" in such desperate struggles as Yvette Guilbert endured, survived, and turned to triumphant account there is no record. Her simple account of these struggles, pathetic in its very simplicity, must be set against the fulsome press notices at the other end of the volume, which occasionally recall that rank scent some women saturate themselves with under the impression that it is alluring. Yvette's father was addicted to the most selfish of all vices—gambling—and he must have been one of the most selfish of its votaries. Her mother he left to struggle as she could to keep herself and her little girl alive. It was a desperate struggle. "There were days when my mother was without food, without fire, without furniture, without a roof to cover her; days when she had nothing, nothing, nothing, except the child in her arms! All this she knew!" Nor were Yvette's own struggles, when she took at last to the stage, less severe or less mortifying. She had, as artists on a higher plane so often have, to create the taste by which she was to be appreciated. Her aim at starting was realism in art. "I had steeped myself at this period in the realistic art as represented by such writers as Zola, Goncourt, and Maupassant, and I tried to do in song what they had done in fiction." But her early failures were so many and crushing that only an unconquerable belief in herself and in her art could have carried her through to victory. When she was howled down by the audience and summarily dismissed by the manager at Lyons, she said to that amazed magnate:—"You have paid me forty francs a day—that is at the rate of 1,200 francs a month, isn't it?" "Yes," he said; "what of it?" "Why," I returned, "before a year has elapsed I shall come back here and you will pay me 1,200 francs a night!" And she did, and he did! Again, when she was dismissed as an absolute failure by the manageress of the Eldorado she assured that lady—who received the assurance with a shout of "spiteful and derisive laughter"—that she would shortly offer her for a night the 700 francs she now paid her a month, an offer which in due course was made, only to be disdainfully declined by the exultant actress. Perhaps Yvette is too severe upon these managers and manageresses who, after all, gave her all they had to give—chance after chance of making her mark upon the stage. The fault was not with them but with the public if she failed to please. I should strongly advise the readers of this fascinating piece of autobiography to read it in Yvette's own idiomatic and dramatic French, which is on one side of the page, rather than in Mr. Harold Simpson's somewhat flat and flabby version to be found on the other.

PARASITES OF PRINCES.

"King's Favourites." By Francis Bickley. With Twelve Illustrations. (London: Methuen and Co., Limited. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The starved cat," says a Spanish proverb, "is all fleas," while ivy fastens on ruins or on oaks in decay; you might expect therefore that Mr. Francis Bickley's "King's Favourites" would have to do for the most part with the parasites of effete princes. There are, of course, exceptions since Queen Elizabeth's Leicester figures amongst these favourites; but nearly all the parasites that appear in this extremely interesting volume fastened upon such effete princes as Juan II. of Castile, or as Henri III. of France, or as our own King Edward III. when in his dotage. To be sure King Henri of Navarre, with his fifty-six mistresses, was the reverse of an effete prince, but he never allowed his harem to influence his policy, either in peace or war. Favourites of this sex and kind count only when they rule as well as reign, and Henri of Navarre was as little likely to be ruled by his mistresses as Elizabeth was likely to allow Leicester to usurp her sceptre. What perhaps strikes you most in these mistresses of kings is their piety, suggesting that there must be something in "Faust's" sneer that emotional religion and love are close akin. Agnes Sorel, e.g., Charles VII.'s mistress, was an exemplary devotee, and bequeathed much to the Church. When, however, her canting beneficiaries, the canons of Loches, applied to Charles's successor to do away with the tomb of this disreputable Magdalene, Louis promptly replied: "Certainly; but then you must give up all her gifts and legacies." The tomb remained undisturbed! Apropos of Agnes, Mr. Bickley's modest way of indicating the immodesty of her dress is rather precious: "Neither her own modesty nor the innocence of men was the end aimed at in the style of her raiment."

NOTABLE NEW NOVELS.

You do not get "forarder" in Mr. E. V. Lucas's delightful "Mr. Ingleside" (Methuen, 6s.) no more than you do in "Tristram Shandy," but in neither case do you care in the least whether the story advances or not. You are in the pleasantest company over your wine, and you are in no hurry to follow the ladies—either Miss Ann or Miss Alison—though, when you do follow them, you are quite as interested in their fortunes as Mr. Lucas expected you to be. It is a novel, in fact, more of character than of incident, and perhaps even more of talk than of action; but at least it is always and deeply interesting.

The opening of Miss Colvill's "The Incubus" (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) rather reminds you of the picture in Punch where the newly-arrived twins are inspected by their supercilious Eton brother, who asks, "And which are we going to keep?" Similarly his little daughters are inspected by their misogynist and misanthropist of a father that he might choose which to keep. The respective manners of the two little ones during the ordeal give the key to the contrast between their characters which is the main motif of the novel. Perhaps Miss Colvill over-accentuates the contrast between the Vivien-like Isabel and her generous and ingenuous heroine, but the story of their inter-relations—whose scenes are laid in England and Egypt—interests you deeply up to its pathetic close.

The heroine of Mr. G. B. Burgin's "Diana of Dreams" (Hutchinson, 6s.) is a widow and its hero is a Turk, and the course of their true love, intersected by that of Roger Illingworth and Betty Santerre, is as full of exciting incidents and accidents as an Arabian Night's tale. "Isn't your craving for excitement satisfied even yet?" asks one of the heroines of the other towards the close; but the other, insatiable as a schoolboy, longs—as every reader of this thrilling romance will long—for even more.

Having known in my time many self-made men and their families, I find Mr. E. F. Benson's parvenus—"The Osbornes" (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.)—improbable, not, of course, in their vulgarity, but in the superficiality of their vulgarity. Surely it would have gone much deeper into the heart and mind than Mr. Benson imagines. But the story is delightful and its heroine charming; though, perhaps, her apotheosis of her husband because of his silence about her brother's forgery of his cheque is a little too Griselda-like.

Mr. Maxwell's "The Rest Cure" (Methuen, 6s.) has also for its subject the marriage of a parvenu with a lady above him; but here the theme is tragic. "The Rest Cure" is on a higher plane than "The Osbornes" and is well sustained upon that plane. The harsh strength of the self-made man absorbed in his business is described to the very life, and to the very life also is described the softening of this harshness in the furnace through which he had to pass before he is finally freed from it by death.

BOOKS FOR THE BAIRNS.

Although it may be deemed full early to set about the pleasant task of selecting Christmas gifts, yet there are many people who prefer to take time by the forelock and to make certain of getting the thing they want rather than put off the purchase until the last moment, and be faced with the necessity of obtaining some subsitute. Particularly is this the case with books. Already the booksellers' orders have been placed with the publishers, and the shelves of the former will soon be ablaze with the red, green, and gold of the gift-book covers. If you leave your selection until too late you may find that public appreciation of the one volume you particularly wanted has been so great that not a copy remains until a new edition has been printed off, and by the time that has been done it will be too late for it to serve as a Christmas gift. Of course there are some popular authors in regard to whose works their publishers know so well the demand which is likely to arise that they prepare for a huge output from the very first. Such a book as Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Rewards and Fairies" (Macmillan, 6s.), for instance, is assured of a huge circulation. The mere fact that it is in the manner of "Puck of Pook's Hill," now in its thirty-fifth thousand, is a sufficient guarantee of popularity. It is a manner which appeals specially to children. Of course, it is not only for children. The older reader will find delight in the knowledge displayed in the pictures of English life in the past which Mr. Kipling paints so deftly, as well as in the excellent craftsmanship which goes to their making. But to younger readers it is the story itself which appeals, and in this volume there is not one which can fail to sustain their interest. If it were not invidious to particularise, one might say that "Marklake Witches" is the gem of the collection.

Fairy Lore.

Let it not be thought, however, that Mr. Rudyard Kipling makes any real excursion into the realms of faery. Puck is merely the magician whom he uses to recreate the scenes of the past at his bidding. For the real occupants of fairyland one must still look to Mrs. Andrew Lang, who is indefatigable in her exploration of the land of never-has-been. One wonders just how many of the various volumes she has brought into being are to be found on nursery bookshelves up and down the land with the original brilliant lines of their covers a little faded, the corners bent, the pages thumbed, yet treasured still, though the generation which read the first of them has gone out into the world of reality. Yet Mrs. Lang is still finding new fairy stories, and "The Lilac Fairy Book" (Longmans, 6s.) is the result. Some of them come from Asia, some from Scotland and Ireland and Wales, others from Portugal and Brittany. Perhaps it would be wrong to describe them as absolutely new, for there is a great likeness in the fairy lore of different peoples, but these variants of the common property of all the nations make a particularly attractive volume.

Another enviable gift book for a child is "The Scottish Fairy Book" (6s.), with which Mr. Fisher Unwin has followed up his Welsh and Irish collections. Miss Elizabeth Grierson has made an admirable selection from the material at her disposal. There are examples of the Celtic heroic stories, of the fairy tales in which hobgoblins play their part, of the tales in which animals are endowed with speech, of mermen and mermaids, of enchantment, and of the legendary stories in which fact and fiction are blended. Then to add to the book's attractiveness there are some charming pictures by Mrs. Meredith.

Lest it should be thought that the trick of the weaving of fairy stories has been forgotten, Mr. Walter Hawes comes along with an entirely new discovery. A good many of those who adventure into fairy land too often forget that the keynote of the good fairy story is simplicity. They overload their narratives with weird names and elaborate descriptions which the child mind cannot follow. That is not Mr. Hawes' way in "Two Waifs in Cloud-land" (5s. net), published by the Walter Scott Publishing Company, a volume which is delightfully adapted to amuse the youngsters. Mr. Hawes may rightfully lay claim to the possession of the same whimsical humour which has made "Alice in Wonderland" a classic, and he gives just the necessary actuality to the doings of the inhabitants of the kingdoms of the air to make the child who gazes skywards people the cloud plains and palaces with the creations of his imagination. Mr. Eden Phillpotts, too, shows that he appreciates the value of simple narrative in "The Flint Heart" (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.), the fairy story which he has written for children all about Dartmoor and its inhabitants, natural and supernatural. There is a moral to this story of the heart of flint, fashioned by Fum in the stone-age for Phutt, which he who runs may read, but its presence does not mean that Mr. Phillpotts ever preaches. There is no flaw in the workmanship of this thoroughly satisfactory volume.

Among time-honoured favourites there may be noted a new edition of Kingsley's "Water Babies" (T. C. and E. C. Jack), daintily illustrated by Katherine Cameron, a reprint of Chamisso's "Shadowless Man" (Chatto, 3s. 6d.), which has inspired the pencil of Mr. Gordon Browne, and a new 6s. edition of "Peter Pan," with some of Mr. Rackham's pictures, which Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have published. Certainly there is no lack of choice for those who would search for gifts amongst the fairy books.

Romance of Reality.

It is not to the mind of every child that the fairy story appeals. There are some to which the need of some familiar object appears to be necessary to set the youthful imagination to work. Their eyes are wide open to the things around them, and they are eager to know more about them. To such the volumes of Messrs. A. and C. Black's animal autobiographies are of thrilling interest. The latest is a life history of "The Tiger" (3s. 6d.), by Lieut.-Col. Mockler-Ferryman, in which the story of the great cat is told from the days of his cubhood until the time arrives when he wins for himself the sovereignty of the forest. Another volume in the same category is "Jack's Insects," by Mr. Edmund Selous (Methuen, 6s.), which will provide a treat to many a youthful entomologist with its combination of fact and fancy, and no doubt will inculcate the truth which Mr. Selous refers to in the last paragraph of the volume, "that it is better to watch one interesting insect alive than to see hundreds and hundreds of them dead."

In the romance of reality something like a corner has been made by Messrs. Seeley and Co., who have already provided a whole library on the subject, and are still busily engaged in adding fresh volumes to it. One of the latest additions is "Adventures Amongst Red Indians" (5s.), by Mr. H. W. G. Hyrst, who has ranged both North and South America for tales of daring deeds of the white men who have invaded the domains of the red man. Here fact is to the full as exciting as anything fiction has to tell. Popularity, too, should wait on "The Romance of the Ship" (5s.), dedicated by Mr. Keble Chatterton to all who see in the ship one of the most romantic works of man, and love her accordingly. There are many boys who will wholeheartedly accept the dedication.

One might also be inclined to place in this category Mr. John Masefield's "A Book of Discoveries" (Wells Gardner, 6s.), for, though cast in the form of fiction, it contains a wealth of information on all sorts of subjects that the boy wants to know about. It is indeed a delightful volume, and Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations definitely add to its value.

Adventure for Boys.

But when all is said and done the boy can hardly be said to be a boy if he cannot appreciate the pure book of adventure of which so lavish a choice is offered to him. Of a truth, though the choice is so lavish, it must be confessed that the gaps left in the ranks of the writers for boys by the deaths of Henty and Manville Fenn have not yet been quite adequately filled. A comparison of some of the stories of Henty which Messrs. Blackie reissue in the 3s. 6d. popular edition of that writer's works, with some of the newer story tellers, makes this abundantly clear. One had hopes that Captain Brereton would have stepped into Mr. Henty's shoes. His earlier stories had very much the same happy blend of fact and fiction which made the Henty story so effective. But in this season's contributions Captain Brereton is not quite so happy. He seems content to give his imagination free rein in order to be topical as in "The Great Aeroplane" (Blackie, 6s.). Of course, he knows how to tell a story, but the impossible lads of the book, who find themselves on an impossible machine and undergo impossible adventures, are not the persons to hold the boy's interest as the young Henty heroes did. Captain Brereton is happier much in "Indian and Scout" (Blackie, 5s.), a tale of the Wild West in the days of the gold rush to California. There the exciting incident with which Captain Brereton always manages to pack his stories rings far more truly. One might, perhaps, venture to prophesy that the most probable successor to Mr. Henty would be Mr. Robert M. Macdonald, who has two most satisfactory books of adventure to his credit this year. But even Mr. Macdonald differs from Mr. Henty in one essential particular. He cannot get away from the idea that the quest for treasure is the one object which will incite the youthful hero to deeds of derring-do. Thus "The Moon God's Secret" (Fisher Unwin, 5s.) is the story of a treasure-hunt. It is a thrilling tale of adventure in the Pacific which will hold the youthful reader breathless, but still, treasure is the object in view. Similarly "The Gold Seekers" (Fisher Unwin, 5s.) set out with their gold-extracting motor to cross the Sahara with no more noble ambition than to win gold dust from the desert sand. Again Mr. Macdonald tells a delightful story, yet Henty's heroes were of a different stamp. Their ideals were not so instinct with the commercialism of the age.

Let it not be thought, however, that all the modern young heroes of boys' fiction of to-day have their eyes on the main chance. Take the hero of "The Boy Bondsman," by Kent Carr (Partridge, 6s.), for instance. He would have scorned the idea as absolutely derogatory. Indeed, the book is a singularly good example of what a boy's book of adventure should be. Its characterisation is excellent, the local colour—it is a story of Virginia in the early days when convicts were sold to the settlers to work on the plantations—is bold and good; the incidents are fresh, the narrative continuously exciting. Another definitely historical romance which is calculated to give any boy hours of entertainment is "Under the Red Rose," by Escott Lynn (Cassell, 5s.). It is a tale of the civil wars which ended with the battle of Bosworth field, and in its 150 pages there is plenty of good fighting. "A Knight Errant" (Seeley, 5s.) is a romance of an older day, a new edition of the story of Amadis of Gaul, relieved of the interpolation of the adventures of other knights which detract from the interest of the main story.

Of course, there are some boys who are inclined to look at the historical romance as a vile attempt of their elders to dose them with knowledge unawares—to give them an historical powder in a spoonful of the jam of romance. If a story of the sea should appeal to these there should be no difficulty in suiting them. Staff-Surgeon T. T. Jeans, R.N., knows well how to spin a good yarn. "On Foreign Service" (Blackie, 6s.) is one of his best. Two brothers are the heroes of the story. One of them is sub-lieutenant on a British cruiser ordered to South American waters to watch British interests during a revolution which is taking place in the Republic of Santa Cruz. He has a brother actively engaged on the side of the revolutionists, and when the "sub" is arrested for his brother complications ensue which give scope for any amount of exciting incident. Or Mr. Harry Collingwood is also equal to telling an up-to-date sea story. "A Middy of the Slave Squadron" (Blackie, 5s.) has enough adventure in it to satisfy any normal boy; or there is "Sea Yarns," by J. A. Barry (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), ten stories of sea adventures in different parts of the world. Should, however, the sea story fail to attract, there is still the story of school life to fall back upon, and one bound to be popular is "The School Mystery," by Ralph Simmonds (Cassell, 3s. 6d.), for it is full of those adventures which might happen any day, but which, unfortunately, do not always come in the way of every boy. Mr. Alfred H. Miles can also be depended upon to turn out a new volume for boys exhibiting the value of courage, resource, and endurance, and "'Twixt Life and Death" (Stanley Paul, 5s.) shows the same admirable selective power which has gone to the making of his earlier books.

Stories for Girls.

Perhaps it would be almost too much to expect any great novelty in the book expressly written for the girl in the schoolroom, but in at least one of the new stories for the season a new and delightful note has been struck. "Three Girls on a Yacht," by E. E. Cowper (Cassell, 5s.), is as vigorous and healthy a story as a girl could have put into her hands. It is more. Mr. Cowper knows what he is writing about, and the girl who reads his yarn will pick up some useful hints about sailing which need not necessarily be the prerogative of her brothers. Indeed, one might almost be disposed to declare that Mr. Cowper has achieved that till yesterday considered an impossible task of writing a real sea story for girls. Less novel and perhaps for that very reason more likely to be generally popular are the numerous stories of girl school life from the bevy of writers who devote their talents to the service of their little sisters. The names of Raymond Jacberns, Rosa Mulholland, Bessie Marchant, May Baldwin, and L. T. Meade are known in every girls' school in the land, and their new stories awaited as eagerly as well, the latest volume from Stratford-on-Avon or the Isle of Man. Miss Raymond Jacberns is a prolific writer. Already this season she has three new volumes to her credit. "An Everyday Romance" (Wells Gardner) is an excellent example of the sort of story she writes for older girls, the tale of endeavour and of difficulties overcome leading up to the inevitable ending of girl's dreams. Miss Jacberns's other two stories are for younger people. "Three Amateur Scouts" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.) is a tale about a little girl who has been sent into the country to run wild after a serious illness, and makes best use of her time by scouting on the B.P. plan. The other, "Poor Uncle Harry" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), tells of the doings of a bevy of youngsters who are placed in charge of an unfortunate bachelor uncle. Both are bright and amusing pictures of child life. Miss May Baldwin has two stories. One is a tale of the daughter of a self-made mill-owner, who after education at a fashionable school finds home life jar upon her. But she comes to learn that polish is not everything, and "Sarah's School Friend" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.) may be said to point an unimpeachable moral. The other of the same author's books, "Two Schoolgirls of Florence" (Chambers, 5s.), is a story of Italian school life of to-day, and as such full of interest to girls who desire to know what school life in other countries is like. Mrs. Meade's books are just the happy mixture of clever characterisation and effective plot to which she has accustomed her admirers. "Rosa Regina" (Chambers, 5s.) is one of them. The other, "A Wild Irish Girl" (Chambers, 6s.), illustrates anew the charm with which Mrs. Meade can depict the quick-tempered, warm-hearted daughters of Erin. Lady Gilbert (Rosa Mulholland) has also chosen Irish girls as heroines for a new story, "The O'Shaughnessy Girls" (Blackie, 6s.) are full of life and spirits. One of them is stage-struck and runs away to join a travelling theatrical company, and if Lady Gilbert had done nothing more than make that adventure end in disaster her story would fulfil a useful purpose. But that is only one of its many excellencies. From Miss Marchant one has learned to expect stories dealing with girl life in the big dominions on the other side of the Atlantic, and again expectations are fulfilled. "A Countess from Canada" (Blackie, 5s.) is a tale of life in the backwoods, excellently told, with a heroine so attractive that the title to which she attains in no way enhances interest in her. For girls, however, who like the glamour of high society, "A Lady of Mettle," by Dorothea Moore (Partridge, 5s.), can be strongly recommended. It is a well-written historical romance of the days of William III.

NOTES.

Mr. Stephen Reynolds' "Alongshore" papers (Macmillan, 6s.), which delighted me on their first appearance in the Westminster Gazette, bear re-reading and again re-reading. Yet more picturesquely interesting are his reprints from Blackwood and other magazines, which I had not heretofore read, where Mr. Reynolds brings home to you that "longshoremen are a breed apart," and a noble breed at that. So vividly dramatic are Mr. Reynolds' pictures of fisherfolk, their lives and their ways, that you come to feel as if you had yourself lived with and loved them.

In "Vanishing England" (Methuen, 15s. net) Mr. P. H. Ditchfield laments the continual disappearance of historic buildings and picturesque relics of the past, but his delightful book shows that after all the country is still wonderfully rich in such treasures. He gives a most interesting account of innumerable antiquities which so far at least have escaped the iconoclasts and destroyers—churches, castles, and mansions, municipal halls, quaint old inns and cottages, old bridges, ancient city walls and gates. He describes, too, some of the old customs and features of rural life that have not yet wholly perished. Many charming drawings by Mr. Fred Roe greatly enhance the attractiveness of the book.

Mr. Allen Fea also deplores the vandalism of the age in his new book "Old English Houses: The Record of a Random Itinerary" (Secker, 10s. 6d. net). Avoiding beaten tracks in his wanderings about the southern and midland counties, Mr. Fea brings to light not a few little known old manor houses with claims to attention by reason of their architectural beauty or romantic associations, and the record of his random itinerary is so fascinating that many readers will desire to follow in his footsteps. The volume is lavishly illustrated from photographs by the author.

Messrs. Rebman will issue next month an important new work, entitled "The Individual and Society, or Psychology and Sociology," from the pen of Professor Baldwin, the eminent American psychologist, whose books are at once authoritative and popular. This week the same publishers have ready a volume by Dr. Charles J. Whitby, entitled "Makers of Men: A Study of Human Initiative." It investigates the problem of individuality by means of an analytical study of forty world-famous men classed under four types, the characteristics of each group being differentiated, the hereditary factor of genius discussed, and the respective rôles of inborn predisposition and environment in determining the career being carefully delineated. The work is copiously illustrated with portraits, many of them reproduced from rare or comparatively inaccessible originals.

Reminiscences of his intimate association with American Presidents from Lincoln to Garfield are given by Colonel W. H. Crook in a volume entitled "Through Five Administrations," which Messrs. Harper are publishing. Colonel Crook was Lincoln's bodyguard at the time of the President's assassination by Booth.

Messrs. Longmans and Co. are bringing out this month a further volume of the "Journal of Elizabeth, Lady Holland," edited by the Earl of Ilchester. It will give an account of two journeys in Spain undertaken by Lord and Lady Holland in 1803-5 and in 1808-9.

Dr. Albert Wilson, whose book on "Education, Personality, and Crime" appeared last year, has written a new and further study of the same subject, which will be published by Messrs. Greening under the title of "Unfinished Man." It will contain valuable notes of Dr. Wilson's many-sided experiences as a specialist in criminology, and will be fully illustrated by photographs and diagrams.

Mrs. Penneli's new book, "Our House" (Unwin, 4s. 6d. net), being concerned with life in Adelphi Terrace, is appropriately issued by the well-known publisher whose imprint bears that historic address. It is a brightly written book, giving an occasional brief glimpse of Whistler and other notable visitors to "our house," but mainly occupied with clever studies of the characters and ways of servants and charwomen, English and French, and with an entertaining account of the varied life of "The Quarter."

There are many series of cheap reprints of famous classics, but in the Readers' Library Messrs. Duckworth make a different appeal to the public by the issue of well-produced half-crown editions of copyright modern works with a distinctive literary quality. A volume just published contains both the first and second series of Mr. Birrell's "Obiter Dicta," which many readers will rejoice to have available in this inexpensive, yet attractive, form; and among the other new volumes are "Italian Poets Since Dante," critical essays by Mr. William Everett; "A Commentary," by Mr. John Galsworthy; and "Essays in Freedom," by Mr. H. W. Nevinson.

By the publication of Mr. Stephen Leacock's "Literary Lapses" (price 3s. 6d. net), Mr. John Lane has introduced to the British public a new American humorist for whom a widespread popularity can be confidently predicted. It is a book of trifles in the form of short sketches, stories, and parodies, but trifles that are irresistibly diverting.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

Unique in the History of Teutonic Literature.

The Foundation of the Nineteenth Century.

A Translation from the German of HOUSTON STEWART CHAMBERLAIN. By JOHN LEES. With an Introduction by LORD REDESDALE. 2 vols., 25s. net. Just Ready.

 This work is unique in the History of Teutonic Literature, for it was conceived and written in German by an Englishman, the son of an English Admiral, who received his education at Cheltenham College. For ten years it has been a standard work dealing with History, Philosophy, Religion, and Art of the World, and of it no less than 80,000 copies have been sold at a high price. But what is perhaps none the less remarkable is the beauty and charm of the style of the writer in his adopted tongue, as it is devoid entirely of the ponderous note of the German language. But the charm in this instance would have vanished had the work not been translated by DR. LEES and edited by LORD REDESDALE. It is only necessary to quote the translator's note:—"Knowledge alone, however complete, of the German and English languages is wholly insufficient for the task of reproduction into English of the erudition, philosophy, scholarship and incomparable style of the original. The poetic touches which adorn this rendering in many cases are due to the fascinating pen and knowledge of LORD REDESDALE, who with the greatest kindness volunteered to act the part of editor and adviser."

The Rejuvenation of a Poet.

The New Inferno.

By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. 4s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"Mr. Stephen Phillips is to be thanked and congratulated on the accomplishment of an arduous feat, which few, perhaps none, of his contemporaries could have brought to such triumphant completion."

Daily Telegraph.—"'The New Inferno' is perhaps the most remarkable book that Mr. Phillips has yet given us."

The Private Life of Cecil Rhodes.

Cecil Rhodes: His Private Life.

By his Private Secretary, PHILIP JOURDAN. 16 Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

Times.—"In some ways it is almost a relief to turn from Sir Lewis Mitchell's more ambitious work to the humble tribute offered to Mr. Rhodes's memory by one of his secretaries. . . . All who love and admire Rhodes will be deeply grateful for this little book of reminiscences."

Morning Post.—". . . the tie of affectionate sympathy between the two grew stronger year by year until it resembled that which subsists or ought to subsist between a father and a son. This friendship was a beautiful thing, and its beauty transfigures the whole book and makes it literature of a rare and precious kind. It is so seldom that one can see a heart through another heart."

A Napoleon Picture Gallery.

Napoleon in Caricature, 1795-1821.

By A. M. BROADLEY, Joint Author of "Napoleon and the Invasion of England," "Dumouriez and the Defence of England Against Napoleon," etc. With an Introductory Essay on "Satire as a Factor in Napoleonic History," by J. HOLLAND ROSE. 24 Full-page Illustrations in Colour and 250 in Black-and-White. 2 vols., 42s.

Times.—"No form of historical diversion could well be more entertaining than the perusal of these international grimaces of defiance, derision, and mortal insult. Mr. Broadley has produced a series of illustrations of the Napoleonic period unrivalled in their kind. He has unravelled the puzzle caricatures with unflagging patience, and he has provided us in the letterpress with just such a gossiping guide to his caricature gallery as the situation requires."

A Great Victorian Novelist.

Harrison Ainsworth and His Friends.

By S. M. ELLIS. 2 vols., 32s. net.

Morning Post.—"'When I devour the pregnant pages of Ainsworth,' wrote Macaulay, 'I am lost in amazement that his wonderful historical novels have not an abiding place in every house. . .' Mr. Ellis has drawn a convincing and astonishing picture of his hero."

A Book of International Interest.

Japan for a Week. Britain for Ever.

By A. M. THOMPSON. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. 5s. net.

"This is one of those charming elusive works that defy description. How can we confine or limit a book that discourses to its readers on such diverse subjects as: A new and fascinating theory of Japanese race. Friendship with the ancient Greeks; the necessity of Blatchford's warnings in the "Daily Mail"; the Yellow Peril; a new view of the German menace; and contains, with all these, charming and delightful pen pictures of Japan and Japanese life?

A Tale of Splendour.

A New Humorist.

Literary Lapses.

By STEPHEN LEACOCK. 3s. 6d. net. Now Ready.

Lombroso, Havelock Ellis, and others have led the way, but the appeal of their important works upon genius is limited by their physiological, rather than psychological, nature. [Nov. 15.

Few are so well qualified to write on this subject as Dr. McBride, whose thirty years' exclusive devotion to the study and treatment of inebriates has given him an experience of an exceptional kind. During that time he has tested all known methods of treatment. Only one method has given any general satisfaction, and he clearly describes that method in the above work. The book is one that should be read by the laity as well as the medical profession, for there is a wealth of experience compressed within its covers. The style is a simple, fluent one, and devoid of technical terms as far as possible.

BOOKS MAKE THE BEST PRESENTS

In Messrs. Chapman and Hall's Autumn List there is something to suit everybody—even the person with the most restricted tastes. Those, for instance, who enjoy a romantic biography will be engrossed by the newest and best balanced account of one of the most mysterious figures in history, which Mr. W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE gives them in CAGLIOSTRO: THE SPLENDOUR AND MISERY OF A MASTER OF MAGIC (16/- net). The book, as Mr. W. L. COURTNEY said in the "Daily Telegraph," is most interesting, and shows "much dramatic force."

Many are interested in the making and selling of books, and in literary history. Carlyle once said that "ten ordinary histories of kings and courtiers were well exchanged against the tenth-part of one good history of booksellers;" but, strange as it may seem, no attempt to tell the story of "the trade" through the ages has been made until now, when we have from the pen of Mr. FRANK A. MUMBY an imposing volume entitled THE ROMANCE OF BOOKSELLING (16/- net). Mr. Mumby's work, which contains a Bibliography by Mr. W. N. Peet, and (like Mr. Trowbridge's "Cagliostro") many photographs, is a "history from the earliest times to the Twentieth Century."

Every English man and woman loves the sea, and cannot fail therefore, to be fascinated by E. HALLAM MOORHOUSE'S new collection of LETTERS OF THE ENGLISH SEAMEN (10/6 net). Naval history is always interesting; but how much more so are the letters of Admirals and common sailors themselves written on the verge of an engagement, or on the very scene of action! The letters range from the time of Drake to that of Nelson, and the value of a volume which glows and palpitates with human, as well as nautical interest, is increased by a number of portraits reproduced in facsimile from old prints.

The fact that Mr. E. TEMPLE THURSTON has won a warm place in the affection of the public is evinced by the fact that his CITY OF BEAUTIFUL NONSENSE is now in its 26th EDITION Thousands will be glad to hear that this novel is now issued in a new form at 6/- net, containing 120 full-page drawings and exquisite little vignettes, by EMILE VERPILLEUX, a young French artist with the most sensitive and sympathetic touch. The qualities that have made this novel so widely popular are undoubtedly its sweet idealism and its whimsical philosophy.

These same qualities are predominant in Mr. THURSTON'S new volume of essays and short stories entitled THE PATCH-WORK PAPERS (5s. net), of which the "Daily Telegraph" remarks that they "form a series of friendly confidences, the reflections and sidelights upon life which emerge in a frank and unaffected conversation between intimates They are just pictures of life, impressions from a novelist's sketch book, with enough colour and finish to convey the direct and vivid record of a thing seen or a thought captured on the wing. And the theme of them all is the beauty of life's simple things."

There is, perhaps, in the literature of Europe no more remarkable specimen of sustained imaginative prose than CARLYLE'S FRENCH REVOLUTION: and to illustrate such a work an artist must be saturated with the symbolic atmosphere. Mr. EDMUND J. SULLIVAN is the only obvious man to attempt such a task; and he it is who has drawn 30 full-page allegorical pictures, and 120 portraits for the new sumptuous edition of the "Revolution" in two large imperial 8vo volumes (£1 1s. net, £3 3s. net).

It is a very different France which Miss BETHAM EDWARDS shows us in her new volume, UNFREQUENTED FRANCE (10/6 net). There is no noise and clamour in these pages, which carry the reader instead, "by river and mead and town," through peaceful byways, where diligence, calèche, and boat are the only means of conveyance and where the American tourist is unknown. Miss Betham Edwards's book abounds in poetical descriptions, is very fully illustrated, and serves to show the inexhaustibleness of France as a holiday ground.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

CARLTON HOTEL.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders in the Carlton Hotel, Limited, was held on the 10th inst. at the Carlton Hotel, Pall Mall, S.W., Mr. William Harris (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. H. E. Rodwell) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said:—Up to the end of the month of April last there seemed every reason to believe that the year covered by the accounts now in your hands would be one of the most prosperous years we had ever had. In the beginning of May, however, an unlooked-for event occurred which in a day completely altered our entire prospects. I refer, of course, to the death of His Majesty King Edward. The effect of that deeply deplored event on our business, both in the Carlton Hotel and the Ritz Hotel, was great and instantaneous, especially in the case of the Ritz, where so many balls, banquets, and other large society functions are given. But the pecuniary loss, great as it was, occupied little of our thoughts, and was a mere detail compared with the irreparable loss sustained by the nation in the removal from among us of the ablest statesman who has worn the British Crown since 1701, whose efforts during a long and laborious life were unceasingly devoted to furthering the interests of his kingdom and people. (Hear, hear.) I also at this point may refer to another more recent, but similarly sad, event—that is, the death of His Serene Highness Prince Francis of Teck. To Prince Francis, who was personally known to your board, we were under great obligations. He was always willing to advise and help us, and repeatedly his advice and help were asked for and gladly given, with great advantage to your interests. His sudden and untimely death is greatly deplored by us, and we have thought it right to honour his memory by sending a donation to the Prince Francis Memorial Fund in connection with the Middlesex Hospital. At the last general meeting I was able to point out to you the favourable nature of the balance-sheet and accounts then presented, contrasted with those for the previous year; and I am glad, on the present occasion, to be able to draw your attention to the fact that the balance-sheet and accounts now submitted are, notwithstanding the adverse effect of the death of King Edward and the very serious effect of the Finance Act upon our profits, even more favourable than the balance-sheet and accounts of twelve months ago. Taking up the balance-sheet in detail, and commencing with the right-hand, or assets, side, you will observe that our lease, buildings, furniture, etc., remain at the same figure at which they have stood for many years, no expenditure in the hotel having been added to capital for ten or more years. The item of "sundry debtors," amounting to £40,872, is a little—about £1,000—higher than the corresponding figure of twelve months ago. Cash on deposit with bankers and on current account and in hand stands at £40,268, as compared with £45,177—a decrease of £4,909. Our sundry investments have risen from £12,641 to £21,738. I may forestall a question on this item by explaining that the bulk of the increase of £9,000 is due to the circumstance that we buy up, in anticipation of the requirements of our sinking funds, any of our debenture stocks which may come on the market for sale, and by so doing we support the market and, at the same time, are saving a considerable amount of money. The amount standing under the head of the Ritz Hotel, London, for mortgages, loans, and share capital now amounts to £710,164, as compared with £720,547 twelve months ago, a reduction of £10,400. The shares we hold in the Ritz-Carlton Restaurant and Hotel Company of New York stand at the figure placed upon them for the purposes of account twelve months ago—namely, £10,000. The foregoing remarks exhaust the items on one side of the balance-sheet, and, turning to the other, you will see that our share capital remains unchanged at £400,000. Our 4 per cent. debenture stock stands at £273,237, as compared with £276,505 twelve months ago, a reduction of £3,268. Our 4½ per cent. debenture stock also shows a reduction, from £281,480 on August 31, 1909, to £275,640 on the present occasion, a reduction of £5,840; and our 4½ per cent. "A" mortgage debentures now stand at £261,500, as against £266,300 twelve months ago, a reduction of exactly £4,800. In total, the reductions effected in our debenture indebtedness during the year amount to £13,908, the whole of which has come out of profits. The loan from our bankers, which two years ago stood at £50,000, was reduced twelve months ago to £40,000, and during the year it has been further reduced to £30,000, at which figure it at present stands. Our sundry creditors, including reserve for repairs and renewals, amount to £58,070, as compared with £54,703 a year ago, an increase of £3,367. Our reserve for the amortisation of the lease of the Carlton Hotel, and our general reserve will, if you adopt the report and accounts now in your hands, amount respectively to £27,847 and £125,000, or, together, £152,847, as contrasted with £139,578 a year ago, an increase of £15,269. The items in the profit and loss account follow the usual form, and, I think, are self-explanatory. The balance of profit, you will observe, notwithstanding the adverse circumstances, I have mentioned, is about £1,400 more than the corresponding figure of last year. (Hear, hear.) The total charges on the other side of the account for interest on debenture stocks and loans amount this year to £35,022, as compared with £36,511 in the previous year, a reduction of £1,489. The increase on one side of the profits by £1,400 and the reduction of the fixed charges on the other by £1,500 enable us to recommend to you the declaration of a final dividend on the ordinary shares at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, making, with the interim dividend, 7 per cent. for the year, as compared with 6 per cent. for the year 1909. We also recommend the transfer of £10,000 to the general reserve, compared with £5,000 a year ago, and the carrying forward to the next account of £6,348—a sum substantially equal to that brought into the present account. On the whole, we regard the result of our operations for the year as satisfactory, and we trust that you will hold the same view. The Ritz Hotel, Piccadilly, was, as I have already stated, very severely affected by the death of His Majesty King Edward. Within two days from the happening of that event no fewer than thirty-eight balls, public dinners, and other social functions were not merely postponed, but absolutely cancelled; and as our receipts from some of these entertainments reach from four to five hundred pounds, you may imagine how seriously His Majesty's death affected us. But, notwithstanding this serious adverse effect, and the enormous additional and wholly inequitable impost laid on us by the Finance Act, we have made a larger profit this year, and I have hopes that the result of our operations in the year on which we have now entered will show a still further improvement. I may here repeat what has been mentioned in this room before—that whether business is good or bad does not affect the policy consistently followed by your board from the commencement, of maintaining at the highest pitch of efficiency the service and equipment of our establishments. No hotels that I know of, in this or any other country, receive more thorough and continuous care in this respect than those in which you are interested. There are a few matters mentioned in the report which I may briefly notice. The Ritz Hotel, Madrid, which was opened on October 2 last by their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain, has every appearance of being a success. A good hotel in the Spanish capital was badly wanted, and the opinions we have received from many guests who have used the hotel justify us in thinking that, in co-operation with the very best element in the city of Madrid, we have supplied that want. We receive, as the price of our goodwill and services, a block of the deferred shares of the Madrid company, which in time should yield dividends. The New York Hotel will open on December 15 next. I have recently been to that city, and all the indications, up to the time I left, pointed to the hotel having a successful career. In this case also we have been fortunate enough to become associated with a large and very influential local group. I mentioned at the last general meeting that our advent in New York had led to our being approached with a view to the establishment of hotels in other cities on the North American Continent. Our experience with regard to the New York Hotel had taught us that it was very difficult and inconvenient to properly conduct such matters from a base of operations so far removed as London, and I mentioned that we were in negotiation with an important group of American gentlemen with a view to the formation of a company, under American law, which would deal with all future American and Canadian enterprises. These negotiations have been concluded on terms satisfactory to us, the incorporation of the Carlton Investing Company, with an influential board, having been effected, the principal object of the company being the establishment and management of hotels and restaurants in any part of the North American continent. We receive, as consideration for our goodwill and for our co-operation on this side of the Atlantic, a substantial block of the common stock of the company so formed; and I have reason to think that this stock will gradually become of value. The Carlton Investing Company has already started operations by acquiring as from February 1 next, on very favourable terms, the lease of the Hotel Schenley, an important, well-known, and well-situated hotel at Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania. Upon this hotel the owners—for the purpose of bringing it up to our standard—propose to spend a sum of from £60,000 to £80,000; and when this money has been spent the hotel, I feel sure, will have all the elements of a successful future, and should contribute to the value of the shares we hold in the Carlton Investing Company. I may mention here that, whilst we have received substantial blocks of shares for our goodwill and co-operation in respect of various enterprises, we have, through such association, gained, and are gaining, advantages of enormous importance—that is, the advantage of bringing home to the travelling public, in a way which no ordinary advertising could possibly do, the merits and advantages of the hotels in London in which we are directly interested. This is especially true of the United States; and in order that you may realise the importance to us of the North American element I would like to tell you that the proportions of the nationalities of every hundred persons who slept in the Carlton Hotel during the year ended August 31, 1910, were as follows:—North American, 37.87 per cent.; British, 33.28 per cent.; French, 8.85 per cent.; German, 6.97 per cent.; Belgian, 2.33 per cent.; Austrian, 1.91 per cent.; Russian, 1.62 per cent.; Scandinavian, 1.59 per cent.; South American, 1.52 per cent.; Dutch, 1.12 per cent.; all others, 2.94 per cent.—100.00 per cent. These figures will tell you that the North American continent is for us the most important country in the world. The policy of your board will consolidate and extend our connections there, and in the other countries in which we have become interested. As mentioned in the report, we have during the year entered into a contract for the management of the Plaza Hotel, Buenos Ayres. The erection of £100 YEARLY TO YOUR WIFE FOR LIFE should she survive you is not more than she deserves. You will be advised how you may easily secure this if you will write The Sun Life of Canada, Norfolk Street, Strand, W.C.

...s hotel was due to the enterprise of Messrs. Tornquist, the well-known bankers, who thereby supplied what had been long felt as a want in the city of Buenos Ayres. The hotel, which is well furnished and equipped and beautifully situated, was opened in September, 1909, by the President of the Argentine Republic. You will also see in the report a reference to the failure of the Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society. The failure of this society concerns us in this way: that they guaranteed the due payment of the interest and the repayment of the principal, when it falls due, of our four-and-a-half per cent. "A" mortgage-debenture stock, and placed the stock at the time it was issued. For the guarantee we are under obligation to pay each year to the society a certain premium, but by a scheme of arrangement of the society's affairs, sanctioned by the Court of Chancery, power is given to the debenture-holders of any company—the debentures of which have been guaranteed by the society—to hold a meeting and to appoint a committee, the duties of the committee being to consider whether or not it is advisable in the interest of the debenture-holders that the guarantee should be continued. A meeting of our four-and-a-half per cent. "A" mortgage-debenture holders was accordingly held, and a committee appointed. The committee held several meetings; but a division of opinion arose between the members as to the best course which, in the interests of the debenture-holders, should be adopted by them. Three members recommend that the payments of the guarantee premium to the Law Guarantee Society should be continued by the Carlton Hotel, as heretofore. The other two members recommend that an endeavour should be made to bring about an agreement with the Carlton Hotel and the liquidators of the Law Guarantee Society, whereby the payment of the annual premium should be discontinued, and one-half of the amount thereof applied in increasing the rate of interest on the debentures, which is ¼ per cent. extra, and the other half applied in expediting the redemption of the principal of the debentures. The decision, as far as the debenture-holders are concerned, rests with the debenture-holders themselves; and a meeting has been convened for the purpose of deciding what they wish should be done. When the negotiations between the debenture-holders, the liquidators of the Law Guarantee Society, and the Carlton Hotel are concluded, the result will be duly reported to you. I have again to thank, on behalf of the board and on behalf of the shareholders, our managers, chefs, and all our servants for their loyal and faithful services during the year. I think that we have a staff in our various hotels of which, although sometimes odd complaints are unavoidable, we ought, on the whole, to be proud.

The Hon. A. G. Brand seconded the resolution.

In the course of the discussion which followed, Mr. Fisher advocated the amalgamation of the Ritz and Carlton Hotels. He also inquired the holding of the directors and what they were paid, and whether it was intended to retain Mr. T. R. Ronald on the board, that gentleman having represented the Law Guarantee Society, which had failed.

Captain Shannon concurred in the views of Mr. Fisher.

Mr. Assinder supported the board, and deprecated the "baiting of the chairman," which had been administered by the same shareholders year after year.

Sir Israel Hart, Sir Thomas Dewar, and Mr. H. L. Savory congratulated Mr. Harris on the very excellent results which had been attained, in spite of considerable difficulties, and warmly praised the management of the hotel.

Replying to the discussion, the Chairman said that the amalgamation of the two hotels would be completed when "the opportune moment" arrived. He refused to give the holdings of the directors beyond saying that they each held the necessary qualification. The directors received £1,500 amongst them. It was their intention to retain Mr. Ronald on the board, as they regarded his assistance as valuable.

The resolution was adopted, and the dividend, as recommended, was approved.

The retiring director, Mr. Harris, was re-elected, and the auditors were reappointed.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, directors, and staff was carried with enthusiasm.

THE HANS CRESCENT HOTEL, LIMITED.

The fourteenth annual general meeting of the Hans Crescent Hotel Company, Limited, was held on the company's premises. Mr. Edward Rawlings (chairman of the company) presided.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said the profits of the year showed a decrease of something like £1,000, attributable mainly to the death of His Majesty King Edward, which had a very prejudicial effect upon all high-class hotels. The Cadogan Rooms, which, except for temporary purposes, had been unlet for some years past, had now been let, and for a period of several years. They were let to substantial tenants at a net rental of £600 a year. During the period since the termination of the year under review, on June 30 up till the present time, they had done, and were doing, extremely good business. For the last two months the house had been practically full, and to-day he did not think that rooms could be obtained in it for any visitor. The directors' policy for the last few years has been to make the hotel as comfortable as it could be. It occupied an absolutely unique position, which fact was, to his mind, a very tangible asset. They were in the centre of the best part of the West End of London, yet for all intents and purposes as regarded quietness they might be fifty miles away in the country. People liked this quietness; they liked a restful place with practically no noise, and when they came to the hotel they remained and came again. The cuisine also, he did not hesitate to say, was second to none in London, and altogether they had established a reputation with regard to this hotel which would bear tangible fruit at no distant date. They had there from time to time members of the very best families. Royalty often stayed there; and when they came once they invariably came back. Indian princes came there. One Indian prince had come there three times. He liked it so well on the first occasion that he returned, and returned again, and was in the hotel to-day. There were ladies of social position who made this house their permanent home. They had suites of rooms, which they retained when they were away, paying for them, and they came back to spend a further portion of the year in what they called their home. The management did not advertise the hotel, and did not intend to do so. Their best advertisement was their clientèle. They very rarely lost a good customer. Customers returned from time to time bringing their friends with them because of the home-like feeling which pervaded the establishment. The house was extremely suitable for wedding receptions owing to its quietness and its position. They had their share of these functions; sometimes there was a run of weddings. In this connection he would like to say that several people who had visited the hotel and been married from it, when in due course of time their little ones were about to be born came back, giving as their reason for doing so that they felt it was like coming home. A prettier, sweeter, more charming compliment to the manager of the hotel and to the hotel itself it was impossible to conceive. As he had told them, it was the directors' policy to make the hotel as comfortable as possible. They were now reaping the reward of that policy. He looked forward with great hope, more than he had ever done almost since the formation of the company, to the ultimate success of the enterprise in which they were engaged. They had a thoroughly capable and very popular manager, and one who had surrounded himself with a staff, including his kitchen staff, which was second to none in London. He moved the adoption of the report. Mr. Herbert Bennett seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

ROBERT ARTHUR THEATRES COMPANY, LIMITED.

The thirteenth annual general meeting of this company was held on the 14th inst. at the registered offices, 24a, Regent Street, S.W., Mr. Robert Arthur, chairman and managing director, presiding.

The statement of accounts submitted showed the net income for the year, including the amount brought forward, to be £13,586 10s. 1d. The sinking fund now stands at £6,500. Written off for depreciation of stocks, £4,834 3s. 11d. The directors proposed to declare a dividend of 6 per cent. on the preference shares.

The report and accounts were approved and adopted.

Mr. A. M. Ogston was unanimously re-elected a director, and the meeting confirmed the election of Mr. Morris Richardson as an additional director.

The auditors, Messrs. Turquand, Young, and Company, were re-elected.

The Chairman (Mr. Arthur) made a feeling reference to the loss the company had sustained in the death of Mr. Sidney Marler, who, although he only acted as a director for a short period, took a very great interest in the company, and moved that the loss be recorded in the minutes of the meeting, which was unanimously agreed to.

A vote of thanks to the chairman brought the meeting to a close.

SOUTH AFRICAN EXPORT COMPANY, LIMITED.

The sixth ordinary general meeting of the shareholders was held on the 9th inst., at the offices, Dunster House, 12, Mark Lane, E.C., Mr. John J. Stein (chairman and managing director) presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. William T. Edwards, A.C.I.S.) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said:—You will remember that when we met together last year we recommended to you the payment of a dividend of 5 per cent., which, with the 10 per cent. interim dividend declared in the previous June, made up a total dividend of 15 per cent. for the year. I then predicted that the future accounts would also show similarly good results, and am glad to find that this prediction has been more than substantiated, and that we now have the pleasure of recommending a dividend of 20 per cent. for the year to June 30 last, free of income-tax. Our figures will speak for themselves, and therefore it is unnecessary for me to trouble you with any long discourse. I only wish to assure you that your directors have the welfare of this business very much at heart, and that they will continue to make every possible effort, not only in the way of endeavouring to maintain your dividends at their present level, but also in striving to uphold the reputation of your company as trustworthy and reliable shippers, and in so doing we can rely upon retaining the confidence of our English and American buyers. South Africa is now making steady progress, and every year its exports tend to increase. New railways will open up this immense continent more and more, and all this, we hope, will benefit our company in the near future. In conclusion, I am sure that you will approve of our policy in having set aside a further sum of £1,000 to our reserve account, which now amounts to £6,000. I shall now be happy to answer any questions before moving the adoption of the accounts.

Mr. Sidney H. Cotton, in seconding the motion, said that it would be satisfactory to the shareholders to know that the excellent report presented was mainly due to the work of Mr. Stein. That gentleman was not only the chairman, but was also the commercial agent of the company, and the shareholders could congratulate themselves that they had such an able man in control. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was carried unanimously, and a dividend, as recommended, was declared.

Mr. W. K. Eddis was re-elected a director, and the auditors (Messrs. W. A. Browne and Co.) were re-appointed.

Mr. Hollebone proposed that a hearty vote of thanks be given to the chairman and directors for the satisfactory result achieved during the past year, and in doing so congratulated the shareholders upon having at the head of affairs a gentleman of Mr. Stein's capabilities, and upon the bright prospects of the company for the current year.

Mr. A. A. Tilleard seconded the vote, which was unanimously accorded.

QUEER STORY.

JOSIAH'S FIRST PECCADILLO.

(A Story of Lisbon.)

JOSIAH MUGGLEWORTH owned the Una, a thousand-tonner, with the lines and airs of a goddess and the luxurious equipment of a demi-mondaine. She had been a present to Josiah from his father. Muggleworth père possessed a rebellious stomach which brooked not the sea, but he loved to follow his son's cruises in fashionable newspapers, and to enumerate his travelling companions to any one who would listen.

It was the dream of the old man's later years to make Josiah a gentleman, and, though Josiah was not particularly interested in the experiment, he was a dutiful child, and, happily, a sailor by instinct. Muggleworth père had boiled soap in his day, and his aitches were fragile, but he had more savoir faire than Josiah. He knew that, although society is proof against certain phases of the parvenu, it has never yet been known to resist a yacht. And he was right. Society despised the younger Muggleworth because he was an undiluted plebeian, but it patronised him on account of his prospective millions—and the Una.

It annoyed Muggleworth père, who was thorough in all he undertook, to discover that his son wedded the conscience of a Nonconformist to the prudery of a schoolgirl.

"You mustn't be squeamish, Josh, boy," he was wont to advise in expansive after-dinner moods, blinking at his offspring over a vast stretch of "frontage." "No one's squeamish in 'igh life nowadays, and I wants to see you a tip-topper before I go. Kick over the shafts, if you're so minded. A gentleman ain't worth 'is salt who can't go the pace pretty. Only pull hup in time. That's the secret, pull hup in time!"

It was the kind of spring that turns age to youth—full of coy, adorable breezes, intoxicating scents, and soft, mysterious, maddening whispers. The Una had danced her way through the Bay to the tune of favourable winds, and intended making Lisbon preparatory to the Mediterranean, and Heaven knows where else besides.

She carried her owner, stodgy and nautical in blue serge, and she carried his party of guests, who had mostly invited each other, and so relieved their host of much anxiety. They included a Russian prince, a duchess (with a daughter), a member of the Cabinet—an arriving poet—and a female Notoriety who combined short hair and crumpled tea-gowns with some mystic cult, which, though she constantly explained it, was never clear to any one.

It was the night before they reached Lisbon that Josiah's guests somehow discovered—(how does one discover the undiscoverable on board ship?)—that he'd never kissed any woman in all his respectable thirty-five years, save the mother whom he had lost as a boy.

How the duchess laughed! How every one laughed—every one, that is to say, except the Russian prince. He was really angry; the thing was an outrage; it spoilt his digestion.

Josiah sat at the head of the sumptuous saloon table in the evening dress which always gave him the effect of an overfed waiter, and laughed with them, for courtesy, and made nervous little stammering efforts to fend off the prince's sarcasm. He was fairly accustomed to being a whetstone for aristocratic wit, but this joke seemed to jar more than usual. It jarred horribly.

He stayed up that night on deck, smoking shag—a luxury he always indulged in when alone, and tossing things up and down in his orderly matter-of-fact mind.

Being essentially good-natured, he really didn't care a pin for the smoke-room chaff—no, nor for the high-pitched laughter of a dozen duchesses. But the duchess's daughter—there was the rub! She was a haughty and beautiful maiden, and had laughed louder than any one; that, Josiah realised, and flushed at the realisation till his face tingled, was where the sting came in.

"No wild oats, Mr. Muggleworth? Heavens! I wouldn't have you for a husband at any price!"

He could hear her voice now—he always did hear it; he would have heard it distinctly in a crowd of screaming women, yet it wasn't a loud voice. But it had mocked him, and the mockery made his head spin. "I wouldn't have you for a husband at any price." The whole wide sweep of Biscay was filled with it. The waves tossed it either to other, "I wouldn't have you for a husband at any price." The seagulls screeched it. And so Josiah sat biting on the stem of his pipe and meditating earnestly, till he could see the white foam spluttering over the Berlengas quite clearly, and then he sought his bunk with a sigh.

* * * * * *

The big solid square which locks itself on to one of the Lisbon landing stages looked imposing in the morning sunlight. It gave one the idea of a prosperous city, in which poverty is a weakness unknown.

"Tommy" Trevor—a Life Guards' detrimental (invited by the duchess because he had nice eyes and carried parcels well) made Josiah a sporting offer to trot him round the town and "act Cook's" for his edification. He had been born in the city, where his father had once adorned the Embassy, and knew it upside down. So, seeing that the Una had never turned her dainty nose Tagus-wards before, Josiah willingly accepted the offer. The rest of the party arranged garrulously to disport themselves as seemed good to them, and broke up in little groups. The poet evanesced to Cintra alone, to lie in an orange grove.

When Muggleworth had made his oblation to hospitality, he and his cicerone went ashore in the tender. It may be here mentioned that the cicerone was a sunny soul and chronically hard up. He felt virtuous, and intended later on to try for a small loan on the strength of his own condescension.

Josiah was in a curious mood. Every one had noticed it that morning. He constantly see-sawed between two extremes: either he talked volubly about nothing, or else he lay in an abyss of preoccupied silence and heard not a word that was said to him. He seemed as a man nerving himself to some herculean effort. Young Trevor only thought him more of a bore than usual, but was bent on doing his duty now that he'd undertaken the job.

They first inspected the Praça de Commercio, then the cathedral, and several smaller churches. They took a carriage out to Belem, and visited the monastery, and lunched at the Avenida Palace Hotel sumptuously. It was dull work. Trevor slaved like a cab horse, and decided that he should be obliged to double the loan in order to compensate himself: his charge had been so heavy on hand, and such atrociously bad company.

At last they were threading the thronged main streets on their way back to the quay. All Lisbon seemed by now to have turned out, as is its habit when the business of the day is done. Tidy men in sombreros were chatting with still tidier be-kerchiefed women at the street corners. Cavalry soldiers with fierce moustaches, and nothing else of importance, cantered to and fro. Now and then a stately duenna, statuesque beneath her black lace mantilla, swept past them in a carriage.

Trevor glanced at his companion sideways once or twice and wondered what the devil could ail the man. His expression was peculiar, almost epileptic; his round eyes were bloodshot, and he breathed short and hard.

"It can't be drink," thought Tommy; "he's got a blue ribbon clamped on somewhere. Perhaps the little bounder's sickening for something?"

In the midst of these reflections they turned a sharp corner of the Rua do Corpo Santo, and walked suddenly into three fishwomen, carrying home their empty baskets and talking enthusiastically. Two were elderly; but the one against whom Muggleworth cannoned was quite young—young, with the vivid dark beauty that comes with the later teens, perfect health, and southern skies.

Trevor raised his hat mechanically with a muttered apology, and was about to walk on, but Josiah instead of following his example stood stock still, puffing and gasping like a grounded codfish. The girl moved aside to let him pass; but instead of passing he capered heavily in front of her again, and before the other man had time to realise his intentions he had taken her clumsily in his arms and had kissed her—twice—three times—on her dewy red mouth—with loud, smacking bourgeois kisses that could be heard a street off! Happily it was a quiet part in which they had turned; still more happily, only Trevor understood Portuguese. The girl tore herself free in an instant, struggling with the energy of all the Furies rolled into one; her sparkling face grew a slow dark crimson, and then turned ivory white. She looked as if nothing but the stimulation of her extreme wrath kept her from fainting. The basket and mat had fallen from her head, and lay with Muggleworth's soft grey felt hat in the gutter. She threw her two hands upon her wide hips with an indescribable gesture, stamped her bare foot, and leant far back, surveying Josiah from his tan boots to his bare rumpled head, and down again from his bare rumpled head to his tan boots, with eyes that literally blazed and burned with mad rage. She trembled in each limb of her. She cursed him by every saint in every calendar till breath departed. Then, with a quick motion of her quivering head she drew in the other women, who stood by petrified, and they awoke and cursed too. A parrot house was a silent tomb by comparison!

"You fool!" muttered young Trevor. "Oh, you utter fool!" He was divided between amusement and an angry British dislike to taking part in a "scene." "Cut out of this before you get your face scratched. Never mind your hat—run!"

He seized Josiah's substantial arm and dragged him at racing speed down a couple of side alleys and round a corner. The women made no attempt to pursue.

Josiah's brain was whirling; his smart grey flannel suit was sticking in patches to his person.

"What's the matter? Where—the—deuce—are we—going?" he gasped.

"Going? Good God! We're going to give these Graces a wide berth, and sneak down to the quay by devious routes, unless you've a fancy for being mobbed," said his pioneer, grimly. "Manners are a little primitive in these parts, I can tell you. The canaille are over inclined to think themselves downtrodden. Wealth and autocracy aren't popular just now. What in the name of all that's—that's—confusing possessed you, I wonder?"

"Why, Trevor, you said—yourself—only last night that—that girls like—that were always—fair game—you know you did—and ——"

"Rot! In some parts they may be, but here—not that kind. They are as particular as Quakers. You made an infernal bad shot, that's all. It wants an experienced hand. But, I say, Muggs, are you training for a Don Juan, or what's the joke?"

They slackened down to a walk, for now they were out of earshot of the disturbance.

Josiah grinned a conscious grin and drew himself up. It was just the kind of compliment he yearned for at that moment; it was even worth the undignified flight. The disdainful maiden of last evening could laugh at him no longer; perhaps she would even let him—his plump cheeks began to burn; there was something new stirring in his veins, his lips were still tingling pleasantly.

The sun was boring its parting way through a bank of opalescent cloud before they reached the quay. Groups of picturesque men lounged around, lying prone along the stones or standing in small knots smoking and whispering. A few boatmen plied their oars lazily, waiting to be hired.

"We're late," Trevor said, rather hurriedly. "Better take a boat, hadn't we? The last tender isn't due for twenty minutes."

He was uncomfortably conscious that the loungers were eyeing his companion with curiosity; also he caught a muttered word here and there. An obvious Englishman with a fat, perspiring face and a rough head minus a hat is bound to excite comment in any Continental city. In Lisbon everything excites comment.

"All right," acquiesced the master of the Una, indifferently. His thoughts were full of maddening, delightful possibilities. He noticed nothing, and hardly cared whither or when he went.

A boatman, younger than the rest, in a tattered sash and a brown brewer's cap with a yellow border, suddenly thrust up an unshaved countenance at their feet. He had been crouching in his boat immediately beneath them.

"I have the best boat, senhors. I am economico," he pleaded, and went on repeating it again and again.

"No, no, senhors, take me," "and me," cried one or two others; but they made their offers without the usual frenzy, and more as if from force of habit, and they wobbled their oars gently, watching the face of the younger man meanwhile, and nodding their heads.

Muggleworth emerged from his day dreams with a start.

"What is the matter with that fellow? Why are the others grinning?" he demanded, suspiciously. "No, Trevor, I shan't go with him—I don't like his eyes."

"Nonsense, man," snapped Trevor, only bent on getting the dishevelled Josiah away somehow. "Every one's eyes are wild about here. He's all right; only wants a shave, as far as I can see. Come along, we don't want those women following us down here and kicking up the very dickens; let me tell you it's quite on the cards."

Thus adjured, Muggleworth floundered grudgingly in, and in another moment, assisted by the whole gang of idlers, the boat was shoved off.

"Hark! I say, hark! They're laughing out loud now. Let's make him go back, Trevor. It sounds so beastly. There's something wrong with him—there is, I swear there is!"

Josiah started upright in the boat, his wide cheeks blanching.

"Sit down, you ass, and let 'em laugh—and be thankful that they're in a laughing mood. Among hot-blooded people news flies like wildfire. Thank your patron saint that they haven't got wind of that gay Lothario business of yours."

Just at this moment their boatman, after fumbling with one hand in the bottom of his craft, leant forward politely and laid something on Muggleworth's knee.

"The senhor's hat!"

There was an indescribable silence. Trevor's whole expression changed. He bit an exclamation into his moustache, half starting from his seat as he did so. Josiah looked at him sulkily.

"They do know," he complained. "That's why they were guffawing. I tell you, Trevor, it's 'orrid rough luck to amuse people whatever you do. Why, only last night you all laughed at me because——"

But Trevor wasn't listening. He sat watching the hull of the Una loom larger and whiter through the gathering shadows. Also he was keeping a sharp look-out right and left, and more than half an eye on the boatman; therefore he was too much occupied for conversation. But they pushed on without let or hindrance to the middle of the river, where the yacht was anchored.

At last they touched her gangway. Some wind had sprung up with the fall of evening, and there was a heavy tide running. The little boat rose and fell so much that it was difficult to hold her steady.

Trevor, who was nearest, stood up waiting for a wave to lift her; and when it came he leapt on to the platform with a sigh of relief, assisted by a quartermaster who had run down the steps to help. Another billow raised the boat, and Josiah stood up; he had one stumpy foot on the platform preparatory to following Trevor, when the craft gave a sudden lurch, the boathook slipped from the porthole to which it was clinging, and he plunged into the water, nearly dragging the quartermaster, whose hand he held, with him. It was the purest accident. Trevor, from half-way up the gangway stairs, realised this and ground his teeth.

"My Gawd, the master's overboard!" gurgled the quartermaster from below. "And look, look, sir, that heathen with the stubble is a-going in after him."

Trevor leapt down the intervening steps, and the two men stood clutching each other, paralysed for the moment into inaction. Then Trevor tore off his coat and watched the heaving water till some sign should show him the locality of the pair. There wasn't even a bubble.

A few moments passed. Then, quite suddenly, two heads appeared at the foot of the gangway—one black and cropped, and the other—well, even in the dim light, there was something about the other—something indefinite, disjointed, sickly. Trevor and his companions stooped down and lifted out the unwieldy form of Muggleworth.

"The Senhor had the mischance to lose his balance," explained the boatman sorrowfully, spitting water from his mouth and shaking his head like a drenched retriever. "He is assuredly no swimmer. Fortunately I have some skill myself, but I fear in falling he struck his head: he lies so still."

No one answered him; they were too busy with their burden. The boatman drew himself up shoulder high against the platform, and with the agile wriggle of an eel was up the stairs and pulling at Trevor's arm.

"I am a poor man," he whined, "and but for me the stout Senhor——" Trevor turned sharply round and looked at him.

"You are a devil from hell," he said slowly in English. "Go." And without another word or look the man shrank back—threw up his sinewy arms, and plunged after his still drifting boat.

They bore Josiah to his room on deck with the creaking hushed manner of those who seek to hide something unpresentable from the public gaze. They laid the thing that had been Muggleworth on his bunk and rubbed it, and sent for a doctor; but there was nothing to be done.

* * * * * *

"Drowned? Nonsense! I swear to you, doctor, he wasn't underneath whilst I could have counted thirty," said the much worried Trevor; and the quartermaster supported him.

The doctor shrugged his shoulders—he, too, had cropped hair and black, glittering eyes.

"Some people drown easily, Senhor. He was perhaps naturally short of breath—your friend."

The steward, to whom it fell to make the ungainly body as presentable as possible, noticed during his work some ugly marks on the fat throat. The doctor must have seen them too—unless he was wilfully blind.

That evening, not far from the big Post Office which, as every one knows, stands at a corner of the Praça do Commercio, a pair of wild dark eyes sought a pair even wilder and darker. There was a question in the first pair, and the owner of the second pair answered it without words. He just pointed to his own brawny neck and made a small, suggestive movement.

The owner of the first pair sighed a long, quivering sigh.

"Then you may kiss me again, Pedro," she said, holding up her flower face.

And in the kiss that followed, honour expressed itself as satisfied.

ART.

THE accusation of the whited sepulchre—less often thrown up at the Englishman since the entente cordiale—is not difficult to account for. Excellent in his impersonal dealings, the Englishman has always suffered in his personal relations from a severe shyness, which has to be hidden at all costs. Nowhere does this diffidence come out more than in his personal art, where he would like to do and be as others do and are, and where, with the strenuousness of his effort, he gives himself away.

Quite apart from its merits, which time has taught the visitor to take as a matter of course, the annual exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Fund at the galleries of Messrs. Agnew presents the stimulus of an exceptional opportunity for an analysis of English painting. The amateur of the eighteenth-century portraitists will find, as usual, in them the backbone of the exhibition. Landscapes by four of our greatest painters form the second and perhaps most noteworthy factor of the exhibition, while a superb Lancret, at once most typical and most masterly, provides the touchstone by means of which the British section can be tested.

The enormous boom in the eighteenth-century portraitists has its basis in a good many and very different grounds, of which brilliant technical skill, particularly in the case of Sir Joshua, is not the least. As it happens, the sheer prettiness, which is perhaps the most potent of these grounds, is this year less conspicuous, except in the always charming Raeburn portraits and in the beautiful Lawrence "Viscountess Castlereagh," which of a number of this painter's works shows most his delicacy and least his superficiality; the Reynolds "Roffey Family" is a grim presentment of character, while Gainsborough's "John Taylor," son of the founder of Lloyd's Bank, is full of dignity and force of character. The British love—or its converse—of a lord is another reason for popular satisfaction in the majority of the sitters, most of whom could be traced in the British Bible, and finally the conventions—I had almost said the artificiality—of the portraitists open up endless possibilities to those who see life in paint, powder, blue sashes, or snowy fichus; I should not like to venture a computation of the Duchesses of Devonshire who have supported fancy dress balls in picture hats; and the remarkably fine painting of what must otherwise have been thoroughly trivial provides excuses for more than potential duchesses. The Lancret "Ronde Champêtre," while seemingly more trivial in character than these outcomes of the grand manner, throws some light on their real character.

Nothing could be more artificial than the subject of "La Ronde Champêtre." It breathes artificiality in its silken men, its graceful maidens. But here the artificiality of the subject becomes the art of the painter. It is quite possible to imagine Reynolds' "Hon. Mrs. Beresford with her son John" as an ordinary mortal, apart from her muse-like dress and classically coiled hair; the Hon. Mary Monckton again in mufti, and with no picturesque background, would be a much less exquisite wood nymph. "La Ronde Champêtre" on the other hand was born dancing, and will never do anything else but conform to its Dresden china existence. You may prefer the grand manner to Dresden china; but the single-mindedness of Lancret's work—its faithful expression of intention—doubles the effect of its sincerity, whereas our portraitists divide their aims and halve their effect.

In landscape this self-consciousness falls away as might a cloak. And to what heights the British landscapist can rise may be judged from a fine Turner, an Old Crome, a Constable and a Bonington. Perhaps of all the pictures here exhibited I should most like to possess the Constable—this evidence of impressionism before impressionism was invented, abused, and in danger of being forced altogether from its rightful path. The flickering sunlight, the massing of the trees, and the intimate feeling of the picture are evidence of all that is best in the British character, and are in piquant contrast to the elegant, rare, and restrained Bonington, who might almost be said to have invented Japan, or the art of leaving out. The sky of the Old Crome is perhaps a little uninteresting, but the Maas with the little church in the distance is a very characteristic piece of work, while the magnificent Turner "Pas de Calais" has a thoroughly wet and moving sea, and the beautiful glowing tone which has given Turner his place among our painters. Space forbids the mention of several notable pictures, but the visitor with a turn for benevolence and the visitor with a turn for art will find themselves amply gratified in either or both by the exhibition on behalf of the Artists' Benevolent Institution.

At Carfax Gallery Mr. Maresco Pearce is showing some exceptionally charming water colours, chiefly of streets and houses. Mr. Pearce's work is so successful a combination of art and architecture as to raise the question whether their separation is ever permissible. His gift of house-personality comes out more particularly in "Place du Moulin à Vent," with its simple, beautiful colouring, in another phase of the same picture, and in the "Campo San Maurizio." His impressionist sketches are less successful in that they dispense with that just mean of detail in which he is so expert. The simplicity and definition both of his colour and his drawing make this a show to visit.

With the exception of Murillo and Velasquez Spanish painters have received comparatively little of the literary attention bestowed on their Dutch or Italian contemporaries. "Stories of the Spanish Artists" (Chatto and Windus, 7s. 6d. net), therefore, by Sir William Stirling Maxwell, selected and arranged by Senor Luis Carreno, find more room for themselves than is usually the case. The book strikes a happy mean between mere narrative and criticism. Painters from Morales to Goya are dealt with chronologically. The lives of El Greco, who could not bear being taken for Titian, and of Goya, who strikes a note nearly as modern as Whistler, are, perhaps, of greatest interest. As a handbook to Spanish painting and for casual reference the book is both useful and entertaining.

MUSIC.

A PLEA FOR A MORE CHEERFUL ELGAR.

IT is greatly to the credit of the musical public that it has succeeded in appreciating so whole-heartedly the genius of Elgar, for there really would have been considerable excuse for it if it had failed to do so. Elgar's success, indeed, should be an inspiration to all our native composers of serious aim, for it proves that it is in no degree necessary to write popular music in order to win recognition. Elgar's greatest works are in no sense popular. I am almost inclined to say that they have achieved success in spite of themselves. In these works Elgar concedes nothing to the multitude. With the Duke in Browning's poem he might say, "I prefer never to stoop." Sometimes, indeed, he tries even his warmest admirers. There are pages in his violin concerto, as there are in the symphony, which, without being stiff in the sense that the most advanced pages of Strauss or Reger are stiff, yet have little enough of sensuous beauty to commend them.

Not to put too fine a point on it, not a little of Elgar's music is severe to the point of dulness. Brahms himself is not more austere or forbidding in certain moods. I doubt myself if much of it will ever attain anything like real popularity—for numerous performances and real popularity are not necessarily convertible terms. The symphony, for instance, has been given a great many times, but it is certainly not really popular in the sense that Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" is (or was). It is listened to with respect, parts of it please, and the public is impressed by it as a whole, but it never awakens the enthusiasm of a genuinely popular work; and it will be much the same, I fancy, in the case of his new concerto. Like the symphony, it is a predominantly grave and strenuous work. There are some noble and lovely pages, but also not a few of a less appealing kind. A man cannot get outside his own personality, and doubtless it is one of the secrets of Elgar's success that he expresses himself always with such uncompromising sincerity; but one cannot help wishing at times that he could bring himself to take a somewhat more cheerful view of existence.

In many of his smaller works he has shown that he possesses sides to his nature quite other than those which find expression in his symphony and in his concerto, and what many of his admirers would hail now would be a work of larger scope showing something of these same easier and more likeable qualities.

> Do I view this world as a vale of tears?
> Ah, reverend sir, not I!

If only Elgar could acquire something of this more optimistic view of life, and express it in his music, the latter would undoubtedly gain certain elements of humanity and geniality which his larger works rather lack at present. Why can he not give us now a good rousing symphony, with rollicking themes expansively treated, reflecting, not the mystery, by the joy of life? No one could do a work of this kind better than the author of the "Pomp and Circumstance" marches and the "Cockayne" overture, but Sir Edward has, apparently, become almost ashamed of the mood which inspired those blithesome creations in his earlier and less prosperous days. It is to be regretted not only because one gets rather tired of that almost inhumanly remote and other-worldly atmosphere which pervades so much of Elgar's music in its present phase, but also for the sake of the larger public, who find it still less to their liking.

Under this head the situation is rather ironic. After long years we have raised a composer of the first rank. He begins by writing popular works, which catch the public ear, and make him the idol of the masses. Here (it is agreed on all hands) is the real thing at last—a native composer of genius who can write music which the people at large can enjoy. Now he must go one stronger and give us larger works on the same lines. He does—but lo! the larger works are not on the same lines at all. The public listens eagerly, respectfully, with a pathetic longing to enjoy and understand; but alas, with brave outward protestations, has to confess itself secretly disappointed. After the manner of the Meistersingers listening to Sir Walther, it says to itself, "Mann ward nicht klug"; and resigns itself reluctantly once more to the depressing conclusion that no good music—or at all events no good music of modern minting—can be genuinely enjoyable. And Elgar was the very man of all others who might have been expected to demonstrate the contrary! It is not too late, however, for him to do this yet, and I, for one, sincerely hope that he may see his way, now that he has sufficiently attested his seriousness, at least to make the attempt.

A capital performance of "Il Barbiere" might well have drawn a larger audience to Covent Garden on Saturday. But the work is one which can hardly be expected to attract without a "star" cast nowadays. Still, one might have a good many "star" casts without finding such an altogether charming Rosina as Signorina Mignon Nevada, who has the advantage of not merely singing and acting delightfully, but of actually looking the part. She is certainly a young artist of the highest promise, but she will be well advised to guard against taxing her voice too heavily at present. In "Tannhäuser" on Friday Herr Jacques Urlus was a sound Tannhäuser and Miss Marguerite Lémon a not very electrifying Elizabeth.

Besides the production of Elgar's violin concerto, the record of recent events in the concert room has not been very remarkable. Two fine violinists were heard on Friday in Signor Antonio de Grassi and Mr. Sigmund Beel, the former of whom has quickly made a great impression on the violinistic world. On the same day Mr. Plunket Greene's lecture-recital on "Interpretation in Song" combined instruction and entertainment in equal parts. A brilliant violinist heard earlier in the week was Mr. Sasha Culbertson, yet another example of the efficacy of the Sevcik method; that sound pianist, Mr. Herbert Fryer, began on the same day what promises to prove an interesting series of historical recitals; the Klingler and Bohemian Quartets have both been heard; likewise M. de Pachmann, Ysaye, and others. On Monday a pleasant vocal recital was that given at the Bechstein Hall by Miss Elma Baker, an excellent artist who has had the benefit of studying to good purpose under M. Jean de Reszke.

THE THEATRES.

"A Single Man," at the Playhouse.

I CAN always enjoy Mr. Hubert Henry Davies' work because it is so light, pleasant, and happy. He never gives us problems to wrestle with, nor shows us frail ladies spending their "presents" in laying the foundations of what in time to come will be deplorable "pasts." He elects to look on the bright side of life, and so spins fairy tales showing us the world as it should be, all peopled with charming characters in whose company you are very willing to spend a couple of hours after dinner. The nearest approach to a bad character in "A Single Man" is Louise Parker (Miss Nancy Price), and her wickedness merely lies in the fact that she schemes very hard to marry the single man (Mr. Cyril Maude). Mr. Maude is an author who has worked so hard to attain fame that he has never troubled about marriage. Now at forty he feels that family life is a goodly thing, and he thinks so the more because his brother, with a charming little wife and a beautiful bouncing baby, have come to stay with him. He craves for these luxuries, so he proposes to the first woman who comes along—a foolish little schoolgirl minx. He is attracted by her childish spirits, and entirely overlooks the fact that the ideal wife for him is his own patient, adoring little typist, Miss Hilda Trevelyan. That is all there is in the play—the comedy of a man of forty and three women who want to marry him. One is an adventuress, one is a foolish schoolgirl, and the third is a loyal little saint. I suppose men of forty do get foolishly infatuated with babyishness. I know they do in plays, but I altogether resent Mr. Davies' contention that forty is an age at which a man cannot be active. At forty a man in good health should be as active a sportsman, soldier, motorist, or worker as at any time previously, and I know plenty of men who are so. It is not so much, I fancy, that Mr. Maude cannot keep pace with his fiancée's activities as that her baby ways get on his nerves that eventually brings about the breaking off of the engagement and throws him into the arms of Miss Trevelyan.

Mr. Cyril Maude has played many of these engaging creatures who are in love with love, but do not quite know at first with whom. His Robin Worthington is one of the best of them all, while that admirable little artist Miss Hilda Trevelyan gives a beautifully restrained and pathetic performance as the typewriting Cinderella-like secretary. I think Mr. Davies rather overdoes the childishness of Maggie Cottrell (Miss Dulcie Greatwich), the betrothed, but this serves to show up in relief the sterling worth of Miss Trevelyan, who diligently corrects the great man's proofs while he plays nursery games. Miss Florence Haydon is excellent as old Lady Cottrell, while Miss Nancy Price as the scheming Louise Parker, who will stick at nothing "just to get married," has a part that suits her admirably.

"Just to Get Married," at the Little Theatre.

Miss Gertrude Kingston in "Just to Get Married" is a more fortunate woman than Miss Nancy Price in Mr. Davies's play. She wants to get married badly, to use her own words, because she sees no other career open to her, and because she has been brought up to be a "perfectly useless" woman. Much of the play is a really clever and amusing diatribe against bringing up women to think of marriage as the be-all and end-all of their existences, but the bottom rather falls out of the argument when Georgina Vicary, who has thrown over her affianced husband because she does not love him, and is only marrying him "just to get married," goes to him later cap in hand and asks him to take her! Miss Cicely Hamilton is a clever woman, and much of the comedy in her play is delightful, but I never quite understood her heroine. Miss Vicary is a poor relation in the house of a county family. She is an incubus who is perpetually made to feel that a good marriage is expected of her. Accordingly, when Adam Lancaster, a simple, rich, sincere Colonial, appears on the scenes she is shown very forcibly that her business is to catch him, because—well, she is thirty, and such an opportunity may not occur again. Well, she catches him, because he worships the ground she walks on, but when it comes to the eve of the wedding she throws him over for conscientious reasons. In a terrific outburst she explains that she will not be mean enough to accept his great love without being able to give him anything in return, when as a matter of fact it would have been very easy for her to say to him quietly, "I want to get married, and you want to marry me. I do not love you yet, but I can feel it coming on. Will you take me on these conditions?" There is no doubt about her love for him "coming on," because when they both run away subsequently (she to escape from her infuriated family and he to hide his sorrows in London) and meet at a railway station it has developed so well that she proposes to him, as I mentioned above. And now I am wondering what the Suffragists think of this turn in the play, for here is marriage made after all the crowning glory of a woman's life! Frankly I think that the end of the play does not fit the beginning, and again I cannot see why a woman of character such as Georgina Vicary is shown to be should find herself at thirty a "perfectly useless woman." Miss Kingston plays the part well, if academically, but her troubles never moved me once. Mr. Godfrey Tearle's Adam, though, was very simple and sincere. I have never seen him better. Excellent, too, was Mr. Thomas Sidney as the county magnate. Miss Kingston is stagey. Mr. Sidney makes you forget the stage. Of "The Merciful Soul" I will only say that it is a curious little fantasy in which a ghost plays the principal part. It is effective in its mystical way, and very picturesquely mounted.

"Vice Versa," at the Comedy.

"Vice Versa" is not quite a novelty. A version by the late Mr. Edward Rose was produced many years ago, but at last Mr. Anstey has been prevailed upon to prepare a version himself of his famous novel. The result is a delightful farce, full of amusing lines and bubbling over with the humour of a man who is not only one of our neatest writers, but is also one of our greatest humorists. Everyone knows the story of the pompous father who in a rash moment tells the boy about to return to school that he wishes he were in his place, and then finds his soul suddenly projected into that boy, while the son's soul enters his own body. Everyone knows the salutary lessons that he learns when he finds himself forced to return to Dr. Grimstone's preparatory school, but what people do not know and must go and see for themselves is how exceedingly funny are the scenes both at school and at the Bultitudes' home, when the strangely metamorphosed couple have to wrestle with their new surroundings. Mr. Spencer Trevor is delightful as the boy, both when he is young and when his diminutive body contains his father's soul, and he tries to impress his schoolfellows and schoolmaster with his importance. Of course he only irritates the former and incurs the danger of a swishing from the latter, while Mr. Arthur Playfair makes the redoubtable doctor a most entertaining creation. The father is Mr. Frederick Volpé, who found it rather more difficult to assume boyishness than Mr. Trevor to take up elderly ways, but he is too sound an actor not to give an excellent performance. The play still remains "a lesson to fathers," but it is as a wild and merry fantasy that it holds the attention of one and all, and I can easily believe that throughout the holidays it will be an attraction second to none.

* * * * * *

"Mrs. Skeffington," at the Queen's, which has settled down, or, rather, worked up, into being a thoroughly amusing entertainment, is now nightly preceded by a grim little tragedy called "The Menders of Nets." This is the work of Mr. Philip Gibbs, and it deals with the return of a convict who finds his betrothed married to another. It is very gloomy but certainly powerful, and in excellent contrast to the witty dialogue and amusing pictures of military life which Mr. Cosmo Hamilton gives us in the long play.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

SINCE the Newmarket Houghton Meeting I have several times seen a dogmatic assertion that "Pietri will win the Derby." It does not appear to me that the autumn form of Mr. L. de Rothschild's colt was sufficiently good to justify this very confident opinion. Stedfast and King William are more capable of improvement than Pietri, who may prove a difficult colt to train thoroughly next spring. There are great possibilities about Prince Palatine, in spite of his poor performance in the Dewhurst Plate, and Phryxus was not at his best as a two-year-old. Wrinkler was at one time expected to turn out a Derby colt, but he appears to have gone altogether to the bad. My own view of the Derby is that Lord Burgoyne will win if all goes well with him during the next six months, and if he is still the best of his owner's lot. M. E. Blanc has now a really good prospect of being compensated for his numerous disappointments at Epsom. He originally had eight entries for the Derby, but two colts were withdrawn when the minor forfeit was declared, and he is now represented by Lord Burgoyne, by Persimmon; Shetland, by Zinfandel; Courtisan, by Flying Fox; Manzanarès, by Bay Ronald; and Zèbre and Favonio, both by Ajax.

Bayardo's easy victory in the Ascot Cup is extolled as "a wonderful performance." I have often pointed out that it is more necessary to take into account the class of the animals which have been beaten in a race rather than the style in which it has been won. Bayardo simply defeated a lot of handicap horses and non-stayers at Ascot, putting aside Bronzino, who was not properly fit, and Seasick II., who had lost the good form which he showed as a three-year-old. Many attempts have been made to explain away Bayardo's defeat at Goodwood, but the fact remains that he was unable to beat a moderate three-year-old at 17 lbs. more than weight-for-age.

Two of the most popular weight-for-age events at northern meetings are the Seaton Delaval Plate of £1,200 and the North Derby of £1,500 at the Newcastle summer fixture. There are no fewer than 150 entries for the Seaton Delaval Plate for 1912, and 109 for the North Derby for 1913. The minor forfeit for each race is only £3, a condition which considerably contributes to their success. The largest subscriber to the Seaton Delaval Plate is Mr. H. Cholmondeley, who has entered fifteen of the Sledmere foals, including colts by Radium out of Aida, by John of Gaunt out of Elizabeth M. an dout of Game Chick, and fillies by St. Frusquin out of Hackler's Pride and by William the Third out of Simplify.

I was interested to read in the Sporting Times that Bothwell, winner of the sensational Two Thousand of 1871, ended his days in the possession of the late Mr. Thomas Boughey, when carrying one of the whippers-in with the Albrighton Foxhounds. Bothwell was quietly backed to win a large stake for the Two Thousand by a very clever division, because it had become known to them that King of the Forest and Sterling were both exceedingly backward. The race was generally regarded as a match between the pair, but they simply stopped from lack of condition, and Bothwell won. Sir Robert Jardine's horse started a great favourite for the Derby, which was won by Favonius, and the division which went for Bothwell at Newmarket now stood heavily against him, knowing him to be a very moderate horse. If Sterling and King of the Forest had been fit on the Two Thousand day it is quite certain that Bothwell would never have seen the way they went. It was by an oversight that Favonius (then known as the Zephyr colt) had not been engaged in the Two Thousand, which he would have won easily enough as matters stood, although he was backward. If Favonius had been qualified to run at Newmarket, then Baron Meyer de Rothschild would have won all five of the great three-year-old stakes of the season. Hannah, winner of the One Thousand, Oaks, and St. Leger, was far behind Favonius, and is was lucky for the mare that she did not meet King of the Forest at Doncaster.

I see it is announced that Christmas Daisy has been sent to France, where he will be trained for some of the great hurdle races. If this horse is beaten for one or two jumping races I daresay we shall see him winning a third Cambridgeshire, as the handicapper would, no doubt, in that case, throw him in with a ridiculous weight. Christmas Daisy is all right if he jumps off in front at the start, and is then able to come along at his best speed, but if he did not get away well it is quite probable that he would be practically out of the race at once. He certainly appeared to have a lot of weight in hand in both the Cambridgeshires he has won, but some good judges are of the opinion that he was not more than 7 lbs. to the good in either race. This appears to me to be too low an estimate.

The Great Tom Stakes at Lincoln is a handicap which has maintained its position in spite of the springing up of several back-end races of the same class which are of considerably greater value. The American horse Delirium started a slightly better favourite than Arranmore and Duke Michael, but the race was won easily by Vigilance, who had no price in the betting. The winner was much fancied for the Lincolnshire Handicap, but then he failed to stay the course. Delirium has been a most disappointing horse, and his running with Vigilance shows that he must have deteriorated considerably since the beginning of the season. Arranmore could probably have been placed if he had been ridden out. The course was scarcely far enough for Mr. Joel's horse, who seems to do best over a mile. Golden Rod, winner of the Stewards' Cup, failed to stay the course, and this horse need not be thought of when the distance is over six furlongs.

I was amused the other day to read in one of the papers that Mr. J. B. Joel threw away the Ascot Cup last year when he withdrew Your Majesty from that race in order to keep him for the Prince of Wales' Stakes at Newmarket. Your Majesty was not properly fit, and his subsequent running at Newmarket showed that he had evidently lost his form altogether. He could no more have won the Gold Cup than have flown in the air. Bomba was a lucky horse on the Cup day, not on account of the absence of Your Majesty, who could have had no earthly chance of winning, but because Amadis was not included in the field. Lord Falmouth's horse had lost Bomba in the race for the Gold Vase, and on that form he must have won the Gold Cup, as the pair would have met on the same terms as in the earlier race.

The Liverpool Autumn Cup excited very little interest this year, and there was no betting until the day of the race. At one time there was brisk speculation for a fortnight over the handicap, and horses were backed to win large stakes before the conclusion of the Newmarket Houghton Meeting. Sunspot was always favourite on Friday, and he was firm at 3 to 1 when the flag fell; Sealed Orders being second in demand at 7 to 1. Mr. J. B. Joel's colt was beaten some distance from home, when Succour appeared likely to win, but Highness came with a rush at the finish, and she won cleverly from Major Kincaid Smith's horse, who was giving her 13 lbs. Electra ran well, but she never looked like winning. It is probable that the heavy going settled the chance of Sunspot, who would very likely have won but for the deluge of rain, which converted part of the course into a swamp. He was palpably stopped by the mud, which was all in favour of Highness.

A great mistake was made by Lord Derby on Wednesday, when he allowed the filly by Chaucer out of Ejector to leave his stable after she had won a selling race. Lord St. Davids (who was staying at Knowsley) gave 500 gs. for the filly, and on Friday she won the Downe Nursery for him.

There will be only a small field for the Derby Cup on Friday. Last Call is a general fancy for this handicap, and Mr. Robinson's colt has been a strong tip from Newmarket during the last week. He obviously has a great chance on paper, and he has been going uncommonly well in his gallops. He can certainly be trusted to stay the course. I expect, however, that the Derby Cup will be won by the best of the Manton lot, which will probably be Declare, as Highness has incurred a penalty of 14 lbs. by winning the Liverpool Cup.

The season finishes next week, which is divided between Warwick and Manchester. The only event of any general interest is the Manchester November Handicap, which is not run until Saturday.

AMATEUR GOLFERS AND TRADE PRIZES.

A certain firm of golf implement manufacturers has issued a form of competition which is ingenious in itself, and which shows a keen appreciation of that genuine spirit of sport that pervades all amateur golfers. Briefly, for every two shillings' worth of goods bought you get a scoring card. At the end of every calendar month a prize of £5 is offered to the player returning the best eclectic score made during the month on any one recognised golf course in the United Kingdom. The score is arrived at by deducting from the gross score the player's handicap, not exceeding 18. The player must play on his lowest handicap. In the event of ties the deciding factors are to be the highest bogey score, the lowest handicaps, the fewest cards. As I have said, the scheme is ingenious. It has all the merits of advertisement, and it exploits the virgin forest of amateurism in no uncertain manner. It will no doubt delight the pot-hunter. As a further advertisement a fifty-pound Challenge Cup is offered to the club that returns the ten best monthly eclectic scores made on its course by its members. The cup is to be held for a year.

Far be it from me to attack legitimate trade or to do anything that may damp the enthusiasm of the advertiser. It may be that somebody is to be paid a percentage on the entries as a reward for his ingenuity in inventing the scheme. But if ever an effort was being made to prostitute a game to trade purposes this is one. The definition of an amateur golfer is still in the bosom of the great ones. That there are men who will try to make money out of the scheme I do not doubt. The first effort in this line was made by the makers of a certain ball, who puffed it in this way. Clubs unblushingly stuck up the notice and the name of the winner. Now they are to push a certain trader. The inducement is that by the publication of the winner's name the club will be advertised. And this is amateurism, to compete for a five pound prize in cash! I have been told by an eminent golfing authority that the real protection that is offered against professionalism is the protection afforded by golf clubs with their ideals of sportsmanship and sporting morality. The competition for the five pound cash prize is certainly an outrage on amateurism. If clubs have any sense of decency they will ignore the competition and debar any members who compete from entering for club competitions. If any club desires to be advertised as an association of hounders from the standpoint of golfing society let it adorn its smoking room with that Challenge Cup and have a shield made to blazon for the benefit of posterity the names of their pot-hunting heroes.

Apart altogether from the amateur question, this method of trading is rather hard on the professional attached to the different clubs. About a twelvemonth ago J. H. Taylor wrote to the golfing press, and urged players to support the local professional. In the club shop he does not own a Klondyke. He is as keen as possible to supply his members at reasonable prices. They expect him to be at their beck and call and to supply their needs at a moment's notice. If members are going to buy goods that they may go in for pot-hunting the professional will be unable to stand such competition. Those who will take advantage of these offers are probably men who clamour for protection in their own business, but they are the last to give it to anybody else. And yet in their own interests it is well to patronise the local professional. Players want a decent class of man to look after their interests. They will fail to get men of this class unless they patronise them. No doubt it is very nice to buy in the cheapest market, but it is not always wise to do so. Other considerations are ofttimes to be taken into account. In the case of the professional you have to remember that you want a local market for your own needs. Necessarily the vendor is not a capitalist. If he were he would not be there. The purchaser may be, and he is merely providing himself with a necessity by creating a market on his own links. The professional cannot offer cash prizes. The big manufacturer can. But if golfers have the interest of the game at heart they will cold shoulder any efforts to exploit the amateur game in the interests of the trade.

There is an excellent essay on Bogey in Golf Illustrated. The poor old colonel is having a bad time with the Americans and with the Midlanders. Efforts are being made to make him a stroke player. Hitherto, with very little compromise, he has made himself an excellent fellow. Of course, he cannot lay stymies, nor do anything else. He is a common ideal, and as such affords a means of standardisation whereby the greatest and weakest may measure themselves. He is an ingenious device whereby match play, which is true golf, is available for competition purposes. To make him a stroke player will be to ruin him. Mr. Garden Smith makes a fine defence for the old gentleman, and protests against the threatening supremacy of paper and pencil players. As to stymies, I never can see why when playing bogey a player should not have to play any stymies that he lays himself. It will be said bogey is assumed to go round by himself. Therefore he can neither lay nor be laid stymies. But as he is assumed never to make a mistake one may assume by a legitimate extension of the fiction that he would never lay himself a stymie if he could. Wherefore if a player makes such a mistake let him be penalised. Such a rule would bring the competition more closely into line with match play. After all, a stymie is in the nature of a fortuitous bunker on the green.

Once again the United States Rhodes scholar had a field day at Oxford in the Freshman's Sports. I do not wonder that athletics are not over-popular when picked athletes from the States invade the University practically every year. In fact, so far as athletics are concerned, the Rhodes endowment is rather a nuisance—to Cambridge. For Rugby football, athletics, and cricket Oxford depends on the bounty of Mr. Rhodes. Oxford men may not like to be reminded of this simple fact, but there it is. The hundred, weight, hammer and high jump went to the States. Parry, from Shrewsbury, showed distinct promise in the quarter and long jump. Lutyens, from Westminster, won both the half and mile, but Whiteley, who ran with bad judgment, is probably the best freshman at that distance. Lutyens is a nephew of the old Cambridge miler. By far the most interesting performance at the meeting was the win by Anderson in the handicap quarter from scratch. This fine hurdler did inside 52 on a sodden track. At Cambridge, there being no Rhodes scholars, the weight and hammer were simply rotten. An Indian cleared 5 ft. 7 ins. in the high jump. Fairrie, from Shrewsbury, won both the sprints and Asshington, Harrow, did a useful half. The best performance was that of Phillips, Highgate, in the hurdles. The mile open handicap was a dead-heat between two men off the 70 yds. mark. The time was slow.

Gray, the young Australian, has scored over a thousand break at billiards. There was a scene of wild enthusiasm. His managers will not let him play Inman. The challenge was issued. Inman gave way on all points. Probably no one was more surprised than Gray's employers to find it was taken up. However, they got out of it. One of the high contracting parties to whom Gray is bound interposed a veto. A proposed conference never came off, and the leading sporting papers were befooled. I do not wonder that one paper is sore. Our London daily sporting press has a high reputation for straightforward and sportsmanlike conduct. The challenge seems to have been issued merely as an advertisement to get a London gate. This is as poor business as it is bad sport. Of course, young Gray is in no way to blame. He is an enfant prodigue in the hands of his employers, to whom he is bound in every way. We shall be told next he plays in somebody's patent elastic braces.

* * * * * *

Whilst the Cambridge Rugby team could only draw with Blackheath, the Oxford fifteen were simply overwhelming Richmond. In Steyn, a South African Rhodes scholar, they have a very fast, straight-running three-quarter. He and Geen will give Cambridge a bad time. The old Merchant Taylors had a day out with the London Irish. The Scottish had a really interesting game with the Glasgow Academicals. It was a good, clean game, admirably refereed by Crimp, and the half-backs never indulged in any harlequinade tomfoolery.

The Navy has scored another record. Commander Royds, superintendent of physical training at Aldershot, has written to General Smith-Dorrien at Aldershot repudiating the charge of inhospitality made anonymously against the Aldershot officers during the recent boxing competitions. The Commander's letter consists of 140 words without a full stop. That is the record. Adopting the Commander's style, the record may be indefinitely extended. The German naval guns are out-ranged and the German grammarians outsentenced by our seamen.

OCTOGENARIAN ATHLETICS.

(As healthy octogenarians we might cultivate the mechanical action of putting . . . . . and become first-class players on the green. But few who take up golf after middle age are winners in the long game.—Golf Illustrated.)

I'm only eighty, but I find
That, though when once upon the green,
My putting is precise and clean,
The longer shots that come between
For ever keep me far behind.

I'm never known to miss the "pot"
When once within a foot of it;
But all my efforts and my wit
Are useless when I try to hit
A straight and true long-distance shot.

This makes me mad; and I propose
That we who've reached the eighth decade
Should have a special golf course made,
Where we, by distance undismayed,
Might fairly match our younger foes.

The length between the greens might be
A matter of a yard or two,
With nothing to obstruct the view,
But every bunker levelled true
From tee to green and green to tee.

For sprightly youths of ninety up
Bath chairs would prove an added boon;
Thus helped, the "slippered pantaloon"
Might reach the winning hole as soon
As younger men—and lift the cup!

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

BUSINESS EXHIBITION OR RAREE SHOW?

TO what extent does the Olympia Show on its existing lines fulfil its purpose? Incidentally the show serves the useful end of bringing forward all the latest inventions and exhibiting the amount of progress which has been effected up to date. But this is not its essential object. The Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders organise it primarily for the more practical purpose of promoting business, and when considered from this point of view the existing arrangements are open to criticism. The fact is that circumstances have changed considerably since these shows were instituted. Originally they were held as much to advertise the movement as to sell cars. They were designed to impress the man in the street hardly less than the prospective purchaser, and there is no doubt that they achieved that purpose. The movement was abundantly advertised. To-day this is no longer necessary. Nevertheless, the show still partakes of the nature of a gigantic fair, and is consequently about as disagreeable a place as possible for transacting real business. It is safe to say that not 1 per cent. of the thousands who visited Olympia last week had the faintest notion of buying cars, or the smallest prospect of ever doing so. They were merely sightseers, who regarded the show as a cheap place of entertainment. The question is whether the trade is wise in spending its money in providing an entertainment of this kind, and whether it would not be better advised in organising its shows in future on a somewhat different basis.

Who is really influenced, for instance, by all the screaming and shouting, literal and figurative, the cheap jack advertising, the noise and the confusion, and the raging and tearing atmosphere in general which obtains? These things give everyone a headache, and they have the effect of distracting the average visitor to such an extent that he usually misses half the things which he would like to see, and only learns of their existence afterwards. This is hardly an ideal state of affairs or one calculated to promote the real interest of the trade. What is wanted is less noise, less confusion, less crowding and pushing; more peace and quiet and more opportunity of actually seeing the exhibits. It looks well, no doubt, to have the floor packed with gaping sightseers, and to see the gallery so thronged that locomotion is hardly possible, but the only effect is to disgust and annoy the comparatively small number who have come with the serious intention of looking at the exhibits with a view to purchase then or thereafter. On certain evenings last week it was practically impossible to get round the galleries at all in consequence of the crowds attracted by the numerous side-shows organised by this and that ingenious exhibitor; and down below it was much the same.

What, then, should be done? The most obvious way to improve matters would be to increase the charge for admission, and the society made a beginning in this direction this year by instituting a five-shilling day in addition to the customary half-crown Royal Automobile Club day. Next year they would be wise if they went further still and made the lowest charge 2s. 6d. throughout the week. A minimum charge of 2s. 6d., increased still further if necessary, on certain days, would not be high enough to keep out anyone proposing to visit the show for practical purposes, but it would probably prove quite high enough to reduce the attendance of the mere loafers who make up so large a proportion of the attendance at present. By raising their prices in this way the Society might possibly take less money at the doors, but they would certainly gain in other ways.

By general consent one of the most interesting features of this year's show has been its coach work. The most unobservant visitor could not fail to be struck by some of the magnificent bodies exhibited by the leading makers, and in particular by the universal adoption of the flush-sided type of body. Beyond question the torpedo, so-called, rules the roost at present. The flush-sided body has probably come to stay, for the simple reason that it has solid advantages to recommend it. It provides the fewest opportunities for the lodgment of dust and dirt, it facilitates washing and cleaning, it is mechanically sound as tending in the direction of lessening wind resistance, and as the form of construction best adapted to its purpose it appears also to the discriminating eye as being therefore the best æsthetically. As a matter of fact, there can be no question as to the more workmanlike and therefore more pleasing appearance of some of the best designed bodies of the present type than that of their predecessors of a few years since, all bulges and curves and meaningless eccentricities of shape.

In one respect, however, there is still room for improvement. It is a curious and anomalous fact that as cars are now designed the occupants of the front seats are actually better protected from wind and weather than those sitting at the back; and as the latter are usually the ladies of the party this is obviously not an ideal state of things. Body designers must now give their minds to the problem of affording to the fair passengers in the back seats at least as much protection as that provided for the driver and his companion in front. A beginning in this direction has already been made by the provision of wind screens for the back passengers, but these leave them still more or less exposed as to the lower part of the body, and certainly less snug than the driver in front securely protected against the elements by his high side doors, scuttle dash, and close-fitting screen.

Pneumatic tyres are now such common objects that many people do not realise how very recently it was that they became practical successes. It was in 1845 that R. W. Thomson invented and took out the first patent for tyres inflated with air. For many years, however, the notion attracted little attention. It was not until 1888, when the pneumatic tyre was re-invented by J. B. Dunlop, who applied it first to a tricycle and subsequently to bicycles, that its commercial possibilities were realised. The story of how the Dunlop tyre struggled against trade prejudice for some years is well known. Mr. Harvey du Cros was at the head of the little band of Dublin enthusiasts who realised the future of the pneumatic, and to him belongs the chief credit for forcing the pneumatic tyre upon the cycle world and thereby paving the way for its subsequent universal employment as an essential component of the motor car. "Essential" because it is not too much to say that without the pneumatic the motor car as we know it could not exist.

During twenty-one years the manufacture of Dunlop tyres has undergone many improvements, and further ones are continually suggesting themselves. Take, for instance, the latest form of cycle tyre which the firm have brought out. This has two rows of rubber studs which project on either side of the central bead and, whilst being out of contact with the ground on a clean road, come into action directly the wheel slopes ever so little away from the vertical, and thus arrest every incipient tendency to side-slipping on greasy surfaces. I have been moved to these reflections by receipt of a well got up little booklet, reproducing the speeches made at the recent public celebration of the "majority" of the pneumatic tyre. This is not only an attractive souvenir but a handy historical record of the origin and development of one of the most wonderful mechanical inventions of recent times.

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR MRS. P.,—As I was out of town for the day, I was so glad that James was able to take you and the girls to the Lord Mayor's Show. It would have been unfortunate to miss the advantages of cheap tickets and three-guinea seats for want of a conductor. James enjoyed it immensely. He said afterwards that it showed how well we manage in this country to suit everybody. The Show provided Sir Vezey Strong and his friends with the very natural and innocent pleasure of displaying their new furs and necklaces to a large and sympathetic crowd; the tinsel effects will be imitated by hundreds of the younger and less sophisticated members of the populace; and would-be pageant-masters can here gain the experience necessary for really big pageants, at the same time rising superior to the charge of anachronism in their use in the wrong place of such picturesque words as "arquebuses."

The lack of interest in the result of the Conference is due, less to intelligent anticipation, than to the fact that just at this moment everybody has got a sale of work on. My particular sale was the "Hearth and Home Guild of Aid for Gentlepeople," opened by Princess Marie-Louise of Schleswig-Holstein at Lord Plymouth's house. I was glad to see that crochet mats and egg cosies are on the decline—I wonder, by the way, why so many people insist on making egg-cosies addled-egg colour with a suspicious whitish bow on the top—and I was able to buy nightdress cases, toilet-tidies, workbags, and all the things one never uses oneself for Christmas presents. It is true, of course, that they cost double their real value, but I should probably have had to give something any way, and it is a comfort even to get a little for one's money. Tradespeople, I believe, grumble at sales of work, quite forgetting how many Royalties they provide with a function. I wish, by the way, you would give up Zenana sales and have one for the three estates, gentlepeople, Royalty, and the Peerage.

Lord Cromer is in the wars. Not only do the Adult Suffragists regard him as one of those instances where Satan finds some mischief still, but the Anti-Suffragists, having hung on the neck of a hero, are by no means gratified to find that hero providing them with free yashmaks, just as though they were not Anti-Suffragists at all. I do not know the motive that led Lord Cromer to devote himself so exclusively to what he would call petticoats—possibly seething femininity reminded him of Egypt. Personally, I side with him entirely. He is the one person who has detected in Adult Suffrage merely an excuse for the enfranchisement of women; he is the one person who sees in anti-suffrage a fine basis for the establishment of two or three intelligent Egerias who would like to whisper in the Prime Minister's ear how he should govern the country properly. I hear that these intelligent Egerias are telephoning for hours at a time to Cromer Hall and the Foreign Office to protest that having no babies they can't mind them, and that they only wished this principle to be applied to the common herd. But Lord Cromer takes the anti-suffrage point of view that women shouldn't govern even locally, and that as they are women they had much better leave it all to him. It is a comfort to feel that after all he has got the money.

It is very nice of Caroline to have her clothes made by the Benevolence Company, but it is part of the business not to grumble when they don't fit. The company, I know, pays its girls well, keeps them on in the slack season, and also takes no little credit to itself for its benevolence. The first two points are very laudable; the last has the result that the customer pays double the ordinary price, that the cut is like no other, and that buttons and strings are treated with a high-minded disregard. That Caroline sent her dresses back three times is to me real proof of how far benevolence can go, and is a change from the present-day mania for efficiency. I think, however, that there is room for a dress-making establishment for such people as Caroline, who feel it a duty to pay top prices, but want something for their money as well. If I started one I should make all well-meaning persons look unexpectedly smart and then allay their suspicions by sending home with each garment a tasteful certificate of benevolence signed by the girls.

James and I did a cheap week-end in Paris, coming in for the tail of the Salon d'Automne. Paris looks dirty, unkempt, and is plastered with bills about pro- and anti-sabotage. "Le bâton de Lépine" is a favourite form of chocolate-box. The Salon d'Automne contains pseudo-English furniture, Munichized for German taste, and an exhibition of blue nudity such as to convince an inhabitant of Mars that Paris fashions had distilled themselves down to tasteful touches of woad. A Bacchanalian orgy reminded me of my father-in-law when he took me for the first time round the Blottingham Art Gallery, and, pointing out a grape-crowned enthusiast, said, "That's a picture of Dionysos—our English god Bacchus, you know."

I wonder whether your Tolstoy Society will carry their emulation of the master to retirement with due apology to their families. His action will at least provide them with material for the winter's debates. You will be interested to learn that his sympathy with mankind extended even to sharing in their more human traits. A man I know once stayed with him, and in the course of his visit sat, with a number of disciples, in a circle round the oracle. After a tense silence one of them remarked in a loud voice to my friend: "Look well at him; he is a Christ; he is in every way a Christ." And Tolstoy maintained a pleased silence that gave consent.

Are your hostels for women the same as my "pusseries?" "Hostel," as a title, seems to me to savour overmuch of "fair water," "town dweller," and unction generally. I used to visit an old governess in a "pussery." It suggested comfort, chastened by incessant scales and Czerny exercises pealing down long stone corriders. Although the place was well warmed, everybody wore little shawls and appeared to have no circulation either in fingers or nose-tips. One of my friends objects very strongly to such establishments, saying that "woman's place is the home." I must say that her own flat has many inducements to stop there, and there does seem something morally wrong with women not born to £500 a year of their own. Still, perhaps I should never have married James if I hadn't had dismal anticipations of an eventual "pussery."—

—Always your loving

ENGLISH GIRLS FOR THE COLONIES.

The articles which recently appeared in TRUTH under the title of "Western Men and Eastern Morals" painted the Englishwoman in no favourable light. One correspondent said:—

> The modern white woman is not a blessing to the enterprising man or the planter out East unless the man has money safe and sound; then marry. The European woman will never adapt herself to the local condition of things. Being a white woman, she must keep up her position. That means servants and expenses and trouble which make a bachelor tremble to think of . . . The wife cannot control the servants, and it follows that the husband cannot control his expenses.

A white woman, the same correspondent adds, is "a useless, expensive misery," and that there is no chance for a man to marry until women are taught to live happily on small pay, and, if need be, cook her husband's meals. The letter seems to be written with some prejudice, but the situation it reveals certainly has direct bearing on the movement which is growing up at home to fit English girls for colonial life.

There are numerous schools all over England now for training girls in all useful capacities, hardening them to plenty of labour and accustoming them to the art of "doing without." That kind of woman is much wanted in the Colonies; she is quite as much wanted in such places as Burma, Siam, and the lonelier parts of India.

A 65 h.p. six-cylinder NAPIER car travelled from London to Edinburgh and back without changing speed. This is a record. The petrol consumption was one gallon for every 19·35 miles. Six-cylinder Napier cars are British and best.

It has been proved over and over again that many women have the necessary mental and physical stamina to support loneliness; the pioneers of the West have proved that. They have courage in emergency, and are usually untiring in work.

The various amateur nursing organisations, the Women's Wounded Convoy Corps, the numerous first-aid associations, the Girl Guides, and so forth, are doing good work in the same direction. The training of members of all these organisations includes the broader essentials for life in the Colonies, of course including economy, and they all encourage what may be called a hardy taste in dress, thus meeting two of the indictments against women. As for the third, "over-education," I should be inclined to call it "under-education." A rightly and completely educated woman has inner resources, and knows how to make outward ones for herself.

These movements are all in the hands of women. It is a case of women fitting women for the places where women are most wanted, a work for which they are specially suitable and must be specially commended. The colonial schools vary from enormous establishments to tiny ones taking eight or nine pupils, where life is as nearly as possible what family life in the Colonies would be, save for the larger number in the household.

I have read the curricula of many of these schools, but have not found them to include a good grounding in medicine, though first aid figures in some. The elements of nursing, a knowledge of the best treatment for the more usual illnesses, and even a course in midwifery would be of the greatest value to women going out to the East or to the Colonies. Supposing a trained student does not herself marry, her knowledge will be the means, in all probability, of averting much suffering, and perhaps of saving life. It would, however, be a mistake to teach these subjects with all appliances; they should be taught with regard to life in lonely places, where no appliances are to be had. The woman who is really wanted is the hard worker who knows her routine and is —an important point—emergency-proof. I should like to draw up an examination paper for girls going to the Colonies or the Tropics, to include a few questions such as:—

What would you do
(a) for snake bite?
(b) if the house caught fire?
(c) if you had to make a fire without matches?

and so on.

The letter I have quoted went on to another charge, a hoary one:—

Supposing there are two women on an estate, those two white women will be the biggest enemies, and will cause no end of mischief.

Well, I dare say they will, if they are the dress and pleasure loving idlers described in the rest of the letter. If there is nothing more interesting to be done than quarrelling, women will do that. There have been wars before now because some king felt bored. Give women plenty to do and the capability of doing it, and they will have no time for bickerings.

Apart from the question of nursing, the colonial training given in many places in this country seems admirable; and in at least one instance a finishing college is to be opened in a colony for these home-students. But the question of nursing and medicine is very important, so is that of midwifery. No woman should go out to lonely places without knowing something of the care of women before and after child-birth. If she marries it may save her life; it is more than probable that it will save some other woman's. At any rate, here opens a chance for the English-woman—a chance to fill a place where she is badly wanted, a chance to serve her country and to do it honour. It is a good thing to see how heartily women are working at home to make their sisters capable, all-round, happy, useful women in those distant places where they are so much wanted, instead of letting them be idle and grow discontented in overcrowded little England.

THE UNSENTIMENTAL BACHELOR.

("The modern young man is very greatly lacking in sentiment."—Miss Iris Carter.)

I'd sing thy sunny locks of gold,
These eyes that brightly shine;
I'd hymn these lips that I behold
Red as the ruddy wine;
I'd hymn thee with a poet's fire,
And wert thou cold and hard,
I'd melt thee with a tuneful lyre,
Were I a lyric bard—
But then I'm not.

The stars above should hear me tell
The goodness of thy heart,
And all the universe as well,
When once I got a start;
I'd speak of how thy soul is lit
With truth's seraphic hue;
But when I come to think of it,
Can I believe it true?—
I'm sure I can't.

I'd harp the treasures of thy mind
Versed in a wondrous lore,
Uncribb'd, uncabin'd, unconfined,
Nourished on Nature's store;
I'd sing of how thy silvery tongue
Speaks to me sweet and low,
With scarce an effort of the lung,
Did I not really know—
It never does.

My love for thee I'd now confess
Here on this velvet plush;
Thy pretty cheek to mine I'd press,
And watch the blooming blush;
To thee I'd swear a lasting vow
With palpitating breath,
And tell in shaky accents how
I love thee to the death—
Only I don't!

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—Bidden by Mrs. George Alexander, the fair president of the South St. Pancras Branch of the League of Mercy, I attended a meeting at Pont Street, where I have in my time passed many another pleasant hour. Out of the cruel, rain-swept streets and the howling wind here was a haven of comfort and mercy—mercy tempered with more than justice to our artistic instincts, for Constance Drever, Maurice Farkoa, and George Grossmith amused us, while the realisation of good deeds well done was brought home to us in the speeches made by George Alexander and Captain Jessel and the Rev. C. Metcalfe.

As Alexander's hair grows whiter his face grows ever more youthful. I believe he will yet play young Heidelberg on the jubilee of his management—and may I be there to see!

What an amount of good work this League of Mercy does! All the hospitals in London benefit by it, and there is an amazingly small amount of fuss made about its administration. Every one gives time and service gratis; self-advertisement is an unrecognised quantity, and much popularity lurks in the pleasing practice of accepting gratefully the smallest donation. We are enabled at the cost of a shilling or so to emulate little Jack Horner in his self-laudatory moments, and we may become useful members for a guinea per year. Our courteous hostess most well became an excellent frock set round a waist which does not measure more than twenty inches, and seems to get beautifully less every time I meet it.

Most of the women in the room wore black clothes and small caps of satin or velvet well drawn down over the left eyebrow. I cast an appreciative glance at a costume of dark china blue charmeuse and a short sacque coat of broad-tail lined with blue, crowned with a blue velvet cap with a purple and a blue chrysanthemum at one side; and silently applauded a brown corduroy coat and skirt, bound with braid, and completed with a marabout toque with a pink chrysanthemum in it.

Chrysanthemums are much favoured, and united to a spray of maidenhair fern are now all over London, looking more real than those born of mother Nature, and striking a definitely attractive note on the corsage of a dark dress. A tight skunk band with one of these flowers holding its ends across the throat is on my programme of personal policy, in alliance with a small cap of black and gold brocade bordered with skunk.

To-night William and I revisited the glimpses of the stars, Sir Charles Wyndham and Miss Mary Moore, in "The Liars." The frocks were most worthy of the occasion, and are not revivals, but innovations. Miss Moore deserves the envy of her generation, having found and guarded the secret of perennial youth in face and figure; her outlines viewed dispassionately from every angle might be the glory of a girl of twenty. Very attractive she looks in her first dress of white satin with a ninon tunic embroidered in silks and silver, with blue glimmering through this silver, while streamers of blue at the back have their ends edged with silver embroidery, and her sleeves are formed of silver bugles. Miss Ellis Jeffreys looked delightful, too, in white satin, with pink and silver to decorate it, and Miss Dorothy Thomas graced grey satin with a purple tunic embroidered in purple and grey and silver, a deep soft waistband embroidered in silver also playing its part well on this. Miss Moore's second dress is of pastel cloth with lace at the top, the kimono sleeves and belt bearing large buttons; and she disports gracefully a lace dress adorned with gold fringe and a rose pink belt, and crowned with a black hat with black velvet beneath.

The subsiding Freddy might give the Divorce Commission excuse for a few more complications. The old play went merrily—lying was always a popular amusement—and even Wyndham's persuasive charm could not combat its fascinations—until the last act.

The Prodigal Coat.

We supped at the Carlton, and met some beautiful damsels in their new evening coats. Many miles of skunk were absorbed in their trimming, tapestry and embroidery shared favour for the body scheme, and we noted that ermine has resolved upon reticence, and could a tail unfold, but refrains, its surface remaining pure and white.

Saturday.—I meditated on autumn in the Park all the morning, thinking in prose thoughts that other people have voiced in rhyme, and then walked to see Joan, who showed an utter indifference to my interest in brown trees holding faithfully to their last green leaves, and insisted they were unimportant when compared with the possibility of her flitting South next month, and her doubt if she would be doing her duty to her children in leaving them alone in London for the Christmas holidays.

Being desirous of some peace, tempered with lunch, I thought she was right and wise to do exactly as she pleased, even hinting that she did not look well and needed change.

And then we went shopping, and as a reward for much complacence she promised to give me the long jewelled chain I desired for a Christmas present and furthermore promised to give it in advance. I found my large dark amethysts with much trouble, despoiling an old necklace set in gold for its benefit. The stones are of colossal size—Joan says they are clumsy, but I know they will be effective when united by two inches of chain to a roc pearl and thence to another amethyst. I am devoted to mauve and violet dresses in the evening, and it is impossible to wear these without such addenda, a sufficiency of diamonds being the only alternative. I am getting very tired of the diamond plaques that adorn the chests of all the fair in town, for although the most exquisite workmanship goes to their making, they somehow lack grace, or have a tendency to excessive candour. I could wish them cordially double-faced, and not so prone to turn their backs upon me.

We tea'd, with hot cakes, at the Cleveland Club, which was fuller even than usual of the brave and the fair. Lilian was there, in a new dress of black velvet bearing a transparency of embroidered black chiffon right up to the top of her collarband, and a perfectly flat, quite soft, velvet hat lined with felt and trimmed with two black velvet, silk-lined arum lilies. Mrs. B. was in a new olive green charmeuse gown, with some old gold and Paisley decorating the bodice, and Miss T. had on one of the latest black hats, with a trimming of steel bead cords, steel-tasselled, and she was proudly uttering the last cry in pearl necklaces.

They all seemed far more anxious to get to the tables than to enjoy my more intellectual companionship, and no less than three dames d'industrie put their heads inside the door to demand Joan from me with a sort of "Her money or your life" air, which compelled me from sally lunn to sally forth.

However, we met again in the evening at a party at E's., a far more social gathering, where an elegant gentleman breathed forth French songs at the piano, while many distinguished creatures of light—very light—and learning discoursed at the opposite end of the room. I appreciated a frock of cerise draped with purple worn by a very pretty dark woman with a wreath of green leaves in her hair; and an excellent supper of caviare sandwiches, which were mostly caviare and very little sandwich; and a hot mixed grill far better achieved than most of its kind.

E. looked delightfully picturesque in a dark blue dress embroidered in gold and draped with blue ninon, and her hair was banded with dark blue velvet in the front with small grapes pendant round the back.

Monday.—I went to interview superior dressmakers for a prodigal day-coat which should not be made of fur, but yet could under no circumstances place me under the suspicion of economical inclination. After much deliberation I found the best possible investment to be black chiffon velvet with a skunk border to its hem, and a crossed collar and stole of black and gold tapestry fastening with gold buttons and buttonholes, and edged with skunk. Nita supported me during my struggles, and decided that I must have a black velvet hat lined with pale pink and edged with skunk. She further advised for its decoration an osprey, which I scorned in favour of a large dahlia. Since the collar of the coat is open I shall have the opportunity of airing odd boas the more definitely to escape any suggestion that I do not wear fur coats because my bankers are unsympathetic. A long fur coat is a burden unto which I am not sworn except in very cold weather. I cannot walk beneath it, and, alas! walking is an exercise doctors unkindly suggest whenever I see them. There is a fortune waiting the medico who would specialise in inactivity as a cure for being a woman.

To-night I enjoyed an introduction to the Little Theatre, having missed its opening ceremony whilst in Paris. How amazingly clever of Gertrude Kingston to discover a novelty! Here is something new under the sun—or the limelight. The Wedgwood blue of the walls is a restful background, and the same virtue is well possessed of the chairs and the line of boxes all in the line of sight. That is what has come with a woman at the head of affairs; there is no seat in the house whence we cannot see perfectly. At last I feel in danger of becoming an ardent supporter of my sex. Every theatre should be at heart a rake, then might easily disappear all quarrels about hats. Again, there is an intimate atmosphere about the auditorium which makes it different from any other. Between the acts everybody walked about and talked, wandered into the mauve room to gossip, into the yellow and black-decorated buffet for coffee, aired their best clothes joyously, and felt exhilarated by a sense of camaraderie.

Afterwards there was an informal reception, when the clever pioneer, in graceful lace drapery, received as many congratulations as while she had been playing the heroine in "Just to get Married," which is a good play, revealing accurately the decent struggles of a decent woman, always with the pathos of truth underlying its superficial comedy. The applause was quite terrific after the second act, when the bride so inconveniently repents her wisdom.

Of Miss Kingston's frocks I preferred her saxe blue evening dress with a crystal and silver fringed tunic and an embroidered bodice outlined with fur; and I liked the djibbeh of Miss Dora Barton, the art student, and found the steel network which sheathed the figure of Miss Maud Cressall eminently becoming.

It is an open secret that the play was written by Miss Cicely Hamilton. It takes a woman to understand women.

"And then she hasn't time," said Robert, significantly, when I voiced this theory, after refusing to gratify his desire to spend the week-end with his favourite sister—who suffers from views—mental and rural. Just now I am inclined towards the sea, with a metropolitan yearning for Brighton. I have a scheme for returning there on Friday.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

I have been much interested in an article in the November number of "Nash's Magazine" on "The Problem of Domestic Service," by Mabel Atkinson, M.A., lecturer in Economics at King's College for Women. It is a sensible review of a situation which has been dealt with too often by theoretical writers who know what things ought to be without knowing what they are. The suggestions made for restoring domestic service to popularity among the classes from which domestic servants are drawn fall in with more than one movement existing tentatively already. Undoubtedly some form of social community among themselves is necessary for servants. In small households they live a lonely and unhealthy life unless they are close to their friends, and many mistresses, with some justice, refuse to take a servant from their own neighbourhood, on the grounds that the maid is always wanting to run out, that the relatives are always dropping in (especially at meal times), and that if the latter are very poor there is a strong temptation to the servant to ransack the larder for their benefit. It is one thing for a mistress to give away to the poor and quite another to have a surreptitious leak in her stores.

One servants' club already exists, but it is in the Kingsway district, too far for the majority of servants to get to. Branches of such an institution are badly needed in each district, where servants may meet, may talk to their accredited young men, and may pass their free evenings healthfully and pleasantly. The Friendly Society does not include by any means the majority of servants, nor even of Church of England servants. I believe the great want is for a completely undenominational club for servants, more especially in suburban districts, a club in which supervision should be reduced to a minimum, but in which personal interest could be obtained at will by the servant.

The long hours of domestic service are another drawback, and the co-operative housekeeping which Miss Atkinson suggests as a solution is to be carried out at the new Brent House colony at Hendon, where the servants are to have eight-hour days.

The social stigma on domestic service is an absurd matter; but it is being fast removed. Personally, I believe that the solution of the servant problem lies with SYKES-JOSEPHINE'S "HAUTE NOUVEAUTÉ" CORSETS are ideal; being built on anatomical principles an elegant and graceful contour is created. the "distressed gentlewoman," who, by entering domestic service, will solve her own difficulties and those of other gentlewomen, distressed in a different sense. Mrs. Gamp was as much despised as the modern scullerymaid; the efficient servant of to-morrow will be on as good a footing as the trained nurse of to-day.

Pheasants are universal favourites, so universal that one is apt to get tired of the roast bird which prevails at this season. As a change faisan en casserole is always acceptable.

Faisan en Casserole.—Divide a pheasant into convenient-sized pieces, sautez them with salad oil, 2 chopped shallots, 2 ozs. of minced lean ham, and a stick of minced celery until they are delicately browned, then put them into the heated casserole, mix half a pint of brawn sauce and a gill of claret with the vegetable, stir all until boiling, then strain it on the pheasant, cover the pan, and simmer it in the oven for two hours. Meanwhile, blanch a couple of dozen chestnuts, remove the skin as well as the husks, and braise them with stock, which must be reduced to a glazy consistency; add them to the pheasant, and serve all in the casserole with a napkin pinned round.

A mousse of the bird is most delicious, when it is as airy-fairy as a good mousse should be. Here is a good recipe:—

Mousse de Faisan en Aspic.—Cut the white meat from a large cooked pheasant and place it aside, chop the bones of the bird and stew them with stock and vegetables for three hours, then strain them and reduce the stock to demi glaze, which mix with a gill of good brown sauce. Pound the pheasant, adding the sauce, 2 ozs. of pâté de foie gras, and salt and pepper to taste. Rub the purée through a wire sieve and mix it with 2 spoonfuls of plainly whipped cream and half a gill of cold liquid aspic. Set the mousse in a charlotte mould previously set with aspic and decorated with crescent-shaped pieces of truffle, pour in cold aspic to fill the interstices, and set it in the ice-box. When turned out garnish it with chopped aspic and cube-shaped pieces of ripe tomatoes seasoned with French dressing.

I tasted a delicious réchauffé the other day, which would do equally well for uncooked birds, and can be applied to chicken, duck, goose, turkey, any sort of game, the homely rabbit, which it renders most savoury, or veal. Heavier meats would be less successful. It is very simple to make, and would be convenient for country cottage cookery. Cold, this dish goes into a delicious jelly, which would make it an ideal picnic or shooting-lunch dish. It tastes even more delicious than when it is hot. It is called after the habitat where it was invented.

Studio Réchauffé of Pheasant.—Cut up some cold pheasant into neat pieces. Stew the bones in very little water to make rich stock. Put the stock in a stewpan with some sour milk or cream, a small onion, not cut up, and two tablespoonfuls of Escoffier's Diable sauce. When all is quite hot, remove the onion, put in the pheasant (forcemeat balls may be added with advantage), and let it simmer slowly for half an hour. Bring it to the boil, throw in two handfuls of macaroni, and when the latter (which should be broken very small) is done, serve the whole in a deep dish. Button mushrooms, sliced tomato, and tiny carrots may be added, or a spoonful of mixed herbs, powdered, thrown in; and rice may be used instead of macaroni.

The following is a delightful ice:—

Parfait au Café.—Boil 4 ozs. of sugar in a gill of water, and the juice of half a small lemon, until it forms a thin syrup, pour it gradually on the yolks of 4 eggs, beating constantly, continue whisking it until it is cold, when it has the appearance of thick cream. Turn the cream into the ice machine, and turn it until it is partly frozen; then mix in half a wineglass of Kirsch; finish freezing it, and with it line a bomb mould. Fill the centre with parfait of café, cover it closely, bind round strips of greased paper, and imbed it in ice and salt for three hours. The parfait can be prepared in this way:—Add 4 ozs. of sugar to a teacupful of strong coffee, and boil it until it is reduced about half, pour it on the beaten yolks of two eggs, and whisk it until cold, adding a teaspoonful of extract of coffee. Mix it with a gill of stiffly whipped cream, and partly freeze it before putting it in the mould.

SANATOGEN

For the fountain spring of health all yearn in sickness.

Thither the husband would bear his wife, the mother her child, the young lead the old, the stalwart the sick.

What rapture and happiness would be theirs could they receive a draught of health!

That is what Sanatogen gives.

It is recognised by the medical profession as the supreme reconstituent of the nervous system, and rapidly removes such disquieting symptoms as insomnia, lassitude, depression, disinclination for physical or mental effort, impaired memory, and a morbid apprehension of impending evil.

It rapidly restores the blood, thus curing anæmia.

Its easy digestibility makes it invaluable in dyspepsia and certain diseases of the stomach and bowels.

It is unrivalled in wasting diseases, and is therefore largely used in consumption.

Madame Sarah Grand

the authoress of "The Heavenly Twins," says:—"Sanatogen has done everything for me which it is said to be able to do for cases of nervous debility and exhaustion. I felt the benefit of taking it almost immediately. It is daily bread to my work."

Physician to the Emperor of Austria,

Dr. Kerzl says:—"I have been using Sanatogen with splendid results, and recommend it continually and everywhere because I am thoroughly convinced that it is an excellent food-tonic."

Sanatogen may be obtained of all chemists, price 1s. 9d. to 9s. 6d. per tin. For literature relating to the cases in which it should be taken address The Sanatogen Co., 12 Chenies Street, London.

Notice is Hereby Given that the Ordinary General Meeting of the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa, Limited, will be held at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon Street, London, E.C., on Tuesday, November 22nd, 1910, at noon.

The Report of the Directors for the year ending June 30th, 1910, states that the realised net profit on the year's operations, which is largely derived from dividends received on investments, after deducting Debenture Interest and all outgoings, shows a balance to credit of £993,381 13s. 8d., from which the dividend on the Preference Shares, an interim dividend of 2s. per share on the Ordinary Shares, and French Government Taxes have been provided, leaving £708,400 16s. 0d., which, added to the sum of £71,083 18s. 10d. brought forward from last year, leaves £779,484 14s. 10d.

From this the Directors have made provision to the extent of £200,000 for the further writing down of the prices at which investments in the shares of crushing mines stand in the books of the Company, leaving £579,484 14s. 10d. available for dividend.

In addition to the foregoing realised profit, the Company's share investments as per Schedule No. 1 (apart from any appreciation in value on properties and ventures as per Schedule No. 3) show, on current market prices, a further large unrealised profit.

Investments stand in the books at average cost or under, and all shares are taken into account at prices below those current at the date when the accounts were made up.

Schedules of the Company's principal share investments and unfloated properties are appended to the accounts.

The Directors recommend that a final cash dividend of 15 per cent., and a bonus of 10 per cent., both free of Income Tax, be paid on the 2,000,000 Ordinary Shares, amounting to £500,000, and making with the interim dividend 7s. per share for the year, leaving £79,484 14s. 10d. to be carried to the credit of the current year's Profit and Loss Account.

The Report and Accounts were posted to registered Shareholders on Saturday evening, the 12th November, and the Annual General Meeting of the Shareholders will be held on Tuesday, the 22nd November, at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon Street, London, E.C., at noon.

Copies of the Report, containing full information as to the Company's position, Balance Sheet and Accounts, and Reports by the Joint Managers and Consulting Engineers, can be obtained on application at the Company's Offices in London and Paris.

UNITED MALAYSIAN RUBBER COMPANY, LIMITED.

Report on the Company's Undertaking by Dr. Philip Schidrowitz.

On April 5 last Dr. Philip Schidrowitz, Ph.D., F.C.S., left London for the East with a view to making a report on the undertaking of the United Malaysian Rubber Co., Limited, and the result of Dr. Schidrowitz's visit is now presented to shareholders in the form of a report by that gentleman, together with a number of photographs taken by him.

In his report Dr. Schidrowitz states that he remained close upon a month at the company's works at Goebilt.

The whole of the plant, buildings, and so on are in excellent condition, and the explanation for keeping them so is adequate. The new coolie lines which are in course of erection are, in the opinion of Dr. Schidrowitz, at least equal to, and possibly superior to, anything he saw in the East. The water is derived from a catchment area, situated in the hills about three miles from the plant. The rainfall of this district is about 160 inches per annum. The dam which has been constructed, and which he inspected during his visit, holds 750,000 gallons. The water supply, therefore, is now all that can be desired. After carefully inspecting all parts of the works, and also the books of the company regarding items of cost, Dr. Schidrowitz has come to the conclusion that the sum mentioned in the prospectus as indicating the value of the works—namely, £40,000—represents a conservative estimate.

The Main Process.

The main process employed at the Goebilt works consists of a novel and improved method of purifying and refining crude jelutong and producing therefrom a high-grade rubber. Dealing with this process Dr. Schidrowitz proceeds:—

"I may say at once that, on my arrival at Goebilt, I was astonished at the remarkably complete and ingenious means whereby the difficulties in connection with the handling and recovery of the solvent employed—difficulties which in the past have, to my knowledge, caused the failure of similar projects—had been overcome. The inventor, M. Féval, and Mr. Cyrus Robinson, who greatly assisted in the mechanical perfection of the process, are to be congratulated on having successfully evolved from a laboratory process, practically at a single step, a practicable, large scale industrial undertaking. Briefly stated, the steps whereby the raw material, jelutong, is converted into high-grade rubber are as follows:—The jelutong is subjected to a simple preliminary purification, and is then extracted with a resin solvent in specially designed vessels. After the removal of the solvent the rubber contained in the extractors—now in a dry and comparatively pure condition—is subjected to a final process of purification, and is then cured. The solvent is recovered in a mechanically very perfect and novel manner, the loss, as ascertained by me over a period of eight days, amounting to almost exactly 0·3 per pound of rubber produced. Since leaving Goebilt I hear this has been still further improved on, and I anticipate that when certain further improvements suggested by me during the course of my stay have been carried out, the loss should not be more than about 0·1 to 0·2 lb. per pound of rubber. . . . Ultimately, I believe, the loss of solvent should not amount to more than about ½d. per pound of rubber, although the figure as ascertained by me personally—namely, 2d.—is, in my opinion, perfectly satisfactory from a commercial point of view.

Cost of Production.

"The main items in the cost of production are (1) the cost of the raw material and (2) the cost of the manufacture (i.e., of refining). Taking the latter first, I estimate, on the basis of figures ascertained by me on the spot from the company's books and from my own observations, that, when running at full capacity, the cost of manufacture will amount to 4d. to 5d. per pound of rubber produced. I am of opinion that the main bye-product obtained in the cost of manufacture—namely, the resin—should ultimately sell at about 2d. per pound, and as there are produced roughly two pounds of resin for one of rubber, the cost of manufacture should be practically covered by the sale of residuals. The cost of raw material will vary somewhat in the different concessions owned by the company. In one concession the company can practically make its own price, and here there should be no difficulty in getting supplies regularly at 4 to 5 dollars (the Straits dollar is roughly = 2s. 4d.) per picul (one picul = 133 1-3 lbs.) In another concession the price arranged would, even on the present high scale of values, yield jelutong at about 4·7 to 5 dollars per picul. In the Sarawak concession there is no fixed price, but the prohibitory export tax here and other considerations must, in my opinion, in the long run, make the company the determining factor in the fixation of price. Up to the present time the position in the Sarawak concession has been that the price of the raw material has varied (as shown by the figures covering a period from September, 1909, to June, 1910) more or less in accordance with the fluctuations of the crude rubber market. This, in my opinion, is a purely temporary state of affairs, but should it continue it merely comes to this: When the price of crude rubber is high the price (in the Sarawak concession) of jelutong is high; but, on the other hand, the company will be obtaining a more than proportionately higher price for its rubber. In estimating the price of jelutong on the company's concession as a whole, I think that 6 dollars per picul is a very fair figure, and this means, assuming that ten pounds of jelutong produces one pound of rubber, that the cost of raw material is 12·6 pence, or slightly over the shilling, per pound of rubber. As a matter of fact, the yield of rubber for the latest period which could be investigated by me in the company's books—namely, February and April, 1910—amounted, taking allowances into consideration, to over 12 per cent., of the jelutong worked up. To sum up my investigations on this point, I have come to the conclusion that when running at full capacity the Goebilt works should produce rubber at (allowing 4d. for resin sales) 1s. or slightly less per pound. Even in the extremely unlikely event of the resin proving to be totally unsaleable the net cost would be only 1s. 3d. to 1s. 4d. When the new works (now commenced) are running, I believe that the cost at works will be (allowing for resin sales) reduced to approximately 10d. per pound or 1s. 2d., without making allowances for bye-products."

Output and Profits.

Continuing, Dr. Schidrowitz states:—"The Goebilt works were designed with a view to producing ten thousand pounds of rubber per day, but so far the full output has not been reached, principally because it was found in practice that a part of the plant was of not sufficient capacity to deal with the whole of the material which could be successfully treated by the remainder of the plant. In addition, there was a temporary shortage of solvent. During my stay in the East the additional necessary plant was ordered and should be erected and working about the beginning of September. An output of ten thousand pounds per day represents over three and a-half million pounds per annum. Assuming that the net profit is no more than 2s. per pound, this means that the Goebilt works alone for the coming year will yield a profit of not less than £365,000, or roughly 18 per cent., on the total capital. I anticipate, however, that the profits (which are necessarily dependent upon the crude rubber market) will be very much higher than this. At the beginning of the coming year the new works, which it is proposed to erect on Karimon Island, should, in my opinion, be running at about 25 per cent. of their full capacity, and by the middle of the year the whole of the new plant should be in operation. The capacity of the proposed new works is three times that of the Goebilt plant, and there should, therefore, in my opinion, be not the slightest difficulty in turning out a total of at least six million pounds of rubber during the coming year. . . . To sum up my opinion in this regard, I hold that the company should at the end of the year 1911 have made a net profit equal at least to a 30 per cent. dividend, and in the event of the crude rubber market remaining high, a much greater sum."

The Main Raw Material.

The main raw material employed for the production of the company's rubber is in the East generally termed jelutong. In Europe different grades of this material are known as jelutong, pontianak, dead Borneo, Palembang, etc. Jelutong is derived from a large forest tree, from the species Dyera, the main variety of which is Dyera costulata. It grows in large numbers in the forests and jungles of Sarawak, of West and South Borneo, of the Federated Malay States, and of Sumatra. The tree is of very large dimensions, and is indeed one of the largest of the forest trees. Dr. Schidrowitz states that he has seen in Sarawak and in the Federated Malay States a number of trees from 4 to 6 ft. in diameter, and from his own observations and from the information which he has obtained from officials, native tappers, etc., the majority of the trees tapped are of approximately the size referred to.

Up to the present the system of native tapping has been somewhat crude, but Dr. Schidrowitz is not of the opinion that there has been any wholesale destruction of trees. The native Malay and Dyak tapper is generally an individual of considerable intelligence, and he appears to be quite aware that the destruction of the trees will in the future mean that he has to go further afield in order to earn his livelihood. . . . The native method of coagulation is distinctly crude, yet it has nevertheless been proved that from material coagulated by native methods good rubber can be obtained. At the same time the observations which Dr. Schidrowitz made during his stay in the East convinced him that a decidedly superior rubber was obtainable by a rational method of coagulation such as that which has already been introduced by the company. Still further improvements in this direction are, in his opinion, possible, and, indeed, news which has arrived from Goebilt since he left there indicates that another appreciable step forward in this direction has been made. Dr. Schidrowitz says that he feels confident, therefore, that as time goes on, and the new methods of coagulation are more generally introduced, and the organisation for the purpose of supervising tapping and coagulation matures, there should be a steady improvement in the quality of the rubber which the company is able to produce. He believes that it will ultimately be possible to produce a rubber which should sell within 5 to 10 per cent. of the price fetched by the highest class of rubber on the market, whether wild or plantation. The company is, in his opinion, already now in a position to produce rubber which should sell within 25 to 30 per cent. of the value of fine hard Para.

Supply of Raw Material.

For the supply of its raw material for the Goebilt plant and the proposed new plant on the Karimon Island, the company is dependent on its own concessions. Dr. Schidrowitz took particular care to obtain from official sources and from official data detail's regarding the nature and extent of the company's concessions. He has seen a certified copy of the Sarawak concession and also the official papers relating to the Federated Malady States concession. He has also seen numerous official papers relating to the South Borneo concessions. Some of the areas which the company has had conceded to it (e.g., the Federated Malay States concession) have not yet been worked for jelutong at all and from the data which he has obtained from official and other sources he has come to the conclusion that when the concessions are developed, and the concessions from which jelutong is being now derived are more highly organised, there should be no difficulty in at least doubling the present supply.

Quality of Rubber.

In regard to the quality of the company's rubber, Dr. Schidrowitz remarks:—

"In my preliminary report I stated that I considered the value of the rubber which the company is now in a position to produce at roughly 25 to 30 per cent. under that of fine hard Para, and under output and profits (above) I have expressed my views regarding the net profit which should result from its sale. As a result of the improvements in quality (see above), which will most certainly be effected in the future, and for other reasons, I feel confident that when (as they ultimately must do) rubber prices fall to a more reasonable level, the company's rubber will not depreciate in price proportionately more than other high-class grades. From my experience in regard to other rubbers from new sources of supply, or, rather, with rubbers of a character somewhat novel to the rubber buyers, and particularly to the dealers, I think it extremely likely that your rubber will not, for some little time (probably three or four months) reach its proper price in the market."

Proposed New Works at Karimon.

The proposed new works on Karimon Island, and the anticipated output of this second plant of thirty thousand pounds of rubber per day, making, together with the ten thousand pounds per day at Goebilt, a total output of forty thousand pounds per day have already been briefly referred to. Karimon Island is situated at from three to four hours' easy steaming for commercial craft from Singapore, and will form an exceedingly convenient centre to which the raw material from the South and West Borneo concessions, from the F.M.S. concession, and from Sumatra can be brought. It is also, practically speaking, on the high road of the world's main steamship routes. In Dr. Schidrowitz's opinion no better spot could have been chosen. He visited Karimon Island, and came to the conclusion that it was an almost ideal spot for the company's purpose. There is an ample water supply, the subsoil is mostly rock, and so excellent for foundations, and there is very deep water within a few yards from the shore. The work of clearing had already commenced at the time of his visit (during the first week of June of this year), and is now, he understands, well advanced. The plans of the machinery, etc., are practically completed, and the necessary preliminary work in connection with the ordering of machinery is well in hand.

The capital of the company authorised and issued, is £3,000,000, and the directorate consists of Sir Percy Cunynghame, Bart. (chairman), Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Mr. Robert Goelet, Sir Francis W. Lowe, M.P., Mr. M. G. Hale, Mr. J. L. Elliot, and the Marquis de Charnacé. The secretary of the company is Mr Alfred Bornin, and the registered office is at 22, Fenchurch Street, London, E.C., though shortly the company will remove to Pinners' Hall, Austin Friars, London, E.C.

A Lovely Figure

is the gift of Nature—but it does not follow that every woman has been fortunately endowed in this respect. When Nature has not dealt too kindly with a woman's figure, the art of the costumier is expected to correct and improve. Without the proper corset foundation, however, the task of the dressmaker is hopeless. But a Royal Worcester Kidfitting Corset will transform an indifferent figure into one of beauty. Where, again, a woman is the happy possessor of a beautiful figure she will never quite be able to realise its full charm until she has fitted it with a "Royal Worcester." It is impossible to appreciate what a difference there can be in corsets until you have actually tried a pair of Royal Worcester Kidfitting Corsets. Their smartness charms you; the mystic way they emphasise the beautiful lines of the figure, and screen what faults there may be, fascinates you; their suppleness and comfort surprise and delight you. Insist on Royal Worcesters, and everything will come right.

PARODIES OF KEATS' SONNET, ENTITLED "ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER."

Much have I wandered where the skies are cold,
And rivers roar in spates and winds blow keen.
O'er many Scottish moorland, bleak or green,
Where birds are reared on Yankee yellow gold;
Oft of one great estate I've heard of old
The purse-proud owner was a trifle mean,
Yet ne'er guessed he what treasures lay unseen
Till Lloyd's Form IV. before him was unrolled.
Then felt he like some "Dodger"* in disguise
When a smart "Bucket"† wins into his den;
Or like a golfer when, from easy lies,
He lands in bunkers, playing out in ten,
And damns his caddie who, in mild surprise,
Shoots out his lips like beak of prairie-hen.

*"Oliver Twist." †"Bleak House."

ON LOOKING INTO THE VOTES FOR WOMEN QUESTION.

Not all that glitters from afar is gold,
Much proves but tinsel when more closely seen.
Yet by its glamour many dupes have been,
And more will be, egregiously cajoled.
Oft of the franchise now is woman told,
And urged to claim it as her own demesne,
In language neither temperate nor serene,
But in a tone obstreperous and bold.
And should this win for her the wondrous prize
How will she deal with each conflicting plan?
Will sapient woman prove herself more wise
In her endeavours than poor, silly man?
What will ensue no mortal can surmise
When John Bull's breeks are worn by Mary Ann.

Ephemeron.

ON LOOKING AT RUDYARD KIPLING'S "REWARDS AND FAIRIES."

Over the Sweet South Downs, all bright with gold
Of glittering gorse and waving corn, I've been;
And often as the sun sets have I seen
The Isle of Wight stand out distinct and bold.
Much of a pleasant "Dean" have I been told,
Which R. K. favours as his choice demesne;
Yet never have the Downs seemed so serene
As when once more, I did our Puck behold—
I felt, as Una did, when from the skies
Proud Gloriana swept into her ken;
Or as when Dan looked up with eagle eyes,
Staring at "Pevensey with its old men,"
While Dan and Una whispered: "We surmise
It would be dull in silent Darien."

Hama.

ON FIRST LOOKING INTO FORM III.

Much time I've wasted in that mart of gold,
And many goodly booms and slumps have seen
(Like Stock Exchange you'll understand I mean):
Where every day the patient public's sold.
Oft of some tempting scheme have I been told
That dark-browed Rothschild ruled as his demesne,
Yet never did I breathe pure rapture keen
Till I heard Churchill speak out loud and bold;
Then felt I like a watcher of the skies
When a new gas-bag* swims into his ken;
Or like Lloyd George when he espied his prize,
And spun his Budget, and the publican
Looked at the brewer with a glum surprise
Stranded on a teetotal Darien.

SONNET: PARODY.

Much have I strayed on Dartmoor, bleak and wild,
And many sights both strange and rare have seen.
Round Cranmere pool and Yestor have I been,
In winter drear and summer evening mild.
Thou vast expanse! Nature on thee has smiled,
For man has failed to conquer, ages have passed
And thou remainst the same, yet somewhat changed,
Thy rocks are barer and thy vales so wild
Compared with all the smiling field around
Cultivated by men, with tools of steel,
When only tools of stone on thee is found.
Flint arrowheads there are which made foes reel
Adown the tors, which plenteous here abound.
Silent, no ancient secrets they reveal.

Morvan.

ON FIRST FLYING THROUGH THE AMBIENT AIR.

Oft have I floated, in the land of dreams,
O'er roaring torrent and the vasty main,
O'er hill and dale and undulating plain
Where e'er great Sol doth trace his mighty beams.
Yet never, to my slumb'ring mind, it seems
Was't stranger than a journey in a train,
Nor was there thrill of pleasure and of pain
Like that which through my throbbing brain still streams;
For now with Mercury the upper air I cleave
And, conscious of my power, I satiate
My love of thrills when e'er the ground I leave,
And Distance, by true art, annihilate,
As if Æolus did a fancy weave,
Swiftly, on outspread wings, I aviate!

Triptolemus.

THE HOBBLE SKIRT.

Much have I viewed of styles both new and old,
And many specimens I've lately seen
Round stilted limbs—that leave no room between,
Which we in fealty to Dame Fashion hold.
Oft of a skimpy skirt the "plates" foretold
That Paquin featured for the very lean,
But never did I grasp its measure mean
Till I heard urchins shout out loud and bold—
Then felt I like a real November guy
When a dry squiblet bangs into its ken,
Or like some Venus when with vacant eyes
She stares at her Adonis—and other men
Look at each other with a rare surprise,
Silent upon a path in Harpenden.

Georgina.

A DUKE'S VIEW OF THE FINANCE (1909-10) ACT, 1910.

Oft have I heard that Anarchists controlled
With crafty guile the Liberal machine;
Justly suspicious have I ever been
Of scoundrels plainly thirsting for my gold.
Yet could I not believe, though often told,
That I'd be taxed out of my sires' demesne
(Spelt thus, thus only, will it rhyme with green),
Till I heard George his monstrous Bill unfold.
Then felt I like some scorcher on the skies
Soaring through heights devoid of oxygen;
Or like Jim Jeffries, when, with purple eyes,
He glared at Johnson—and the nigger-men
Winked at each other with a shrewd surmise—
Prostrate, until the judge had counted ten.

Dobbin.

ON READING MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S FIRST BUDGET.

Much have I pondered on the lack of gold
And many searching plans and Budgets seen;
Through undeveloped acres have I been
Which builders, waiting for a profit, hold.
Oft of a Henry George have I been told,
That low-bred man who wanted my demesne,
Yet never did I feel quite unserene
Till I heard Lloyd George speak out loud and bold;
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a balloon lets fall a bag of sand,
Or, like stout Redmond, when with eagle eyes
He glared at the O'Brien—and all his band
Looked at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, a minute's space, in Ireland.

Yola.

Much have I motored in the days of old,
And many a goodly countryside have seen,
On my smooth Daimler I was unco' keen,
Dreaming that car was worth its weight in gold;
For when, swift slipping thro' the twilight cold,
O'er misty moor or 'neath Spring's sun-fleck'd green
I thought no fairer pasture there had been Until I met an aeronaut so bold;
Then felt I like some struggler for TRUTH'S prize,
Who sees his name upon the winning list.
My disused car ere long I did despise;
From the vast motor throng I soon was missed;
My gorgeous biplane dazzles now all eyes—
Silent, a full-blown airman slow I rise.

Wharf.

THOUGHTS OF "ENVOY" REDMOND ON READING DILLON'S REJECTION OF "DAILY EXPRESS" HOME RULE.

Much have I travelled in the quest of gold,
And many goodly States and cities seen.
Round far Canadian townships have I been,
Cadging elusive dollars as of old.
Oft of "Home Rule for Erin" have I told,
When gentle Celts shall rule their own demesne,
Yet never did I grasp what it might mean
Till I read Dillon, venomous and cold;
Then felt I how some horrid scene might rise
And trusting love become embittered hate;
How stout Tay Pay, with scornful, flashing eyes,
Might strike with unpacific fist the great
And only Tim, and then—no wild surmise—
Be haled before a beak (or magistrate).

Sapper.

Much have I read about the pow'r of gold
And many goodly "quids" and "fivers" seen;
In many Safe Deposits have I been,
Which deeds, securities, and jewels hold.
Oft of one wide expanse have I been told
That Monte Cristo ruled as his demesne;
Yet never did I know wealth's joy serene
Till I won TRUTH'S Two Guineas, clear and bold;
Then felt I like some tourist in the skies
When aero prizes swim into his ken,
Or like some black Johnson, when, with swollen eyes,
He stared at Mr. Jeffries— and all his men
Looked at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent until the judge had counted ten.

Cercueil.

ROLLER RINKING.

Much have I revelled, or I should say rolled;
On many goodly skates in Rinkdom been:
Round many a West End brass band sailed serene,
Whose bards in fear for me—appalled—grew cold
Lest of my balance I should lose my hold.
Their deep, loud murmur rose at my demean;
Yet never did I leave—for I was keen—
Till I collapsed—one day—both stumps clean bowled!
Then lay I like some watcher of the skies,
And many new stars swam into my ken!
To be stout! Certes! when you want to rise
Unstared at is terrific! And "Amen"
I've said for ever to such enterprise,
And leant upon my feet alone since then!

Scald.

Oft have I marvelled greatly to behold
Strange sights in many distant lands. I've been
To lovely islands where the dusky Queen
Sought not to dress in Fashion's changing mould;
Nature her garment, plus a cloud of gold
O'ersown with pearls, whose iridescent sheen
Lent lustre to that child of fair Undine.
But now in England (and elsewhere I'm told)
A sight there is to startle any eyes,
Who could have plann'd it is beyond my ken,
I only gaze with wonder and surprise
At hobble skirts that suit not one in ten,
Turning their victims into fearful guys,
Fretting in silent piquo to marry men!

Peakite.

Much have I written, in my quest for gold,
And many parodies, and verses scrawl'd;
At many of my efforts felt appall'd,
And long'd that Puzzle Editor to scold.
Oft, of my faulty rhymes, have I been told,
And felt, the Devil and deep sea between,
Yet never so disgusted have I been
As now, TRUTH'S latest number, I behold.
Now feel I like some pris'ner at the Bar,
Brought by Marconi into durance vile,
Or, like Lloyd George—that so-called Celtic Star—
Whose lustre, Tory prints would fain defile,
Calling on all tax-payers, near and far
Upon his plunder'd hen-roosts now to smile.

Ballantrae.

So much I've heard of late on aerial flight,
And of the feats of men when in the air,
That I determined weather foul or fair
To win my laurels just like Grahame-White.
Soon in my Blériot I was out of sight
With Father Neptune then was crossed "The Pool,"
His rage at me I did my best to cool:
I supped with Uncle Sam then said "Good-night."
On, on I sped past cities, plains and trees,
And might rivers looked like rippling streams.
The North Pole reached. I then began to freeze,
In mockery King Sol sent forth sunbeams.
I then returned my feat mankind to please,
But! woe is me! 'twas just one of my dreams.

THOUGHTS OF A. J. BALFOUR ON LAST LOOKING INTO CHAPLIN'S HOME—THE HOME OF TARIFF REFORM.

Much have I cavilled in these realms of old,
And many goodly steaks and kidneys seen.
Around the Western Highlands have I been;
Each bar, in fealty, to poll wo hold,
Often, at our expense, cheap beer is "sold"(?)
Though deep-brow'd Homo Rulers count it mean.
I freely breathed and thought it all serene
Till I heard Chaplin speak out loud and bold.
Then wept I tears like waters from the skies.
New plans refused to swim into my ken;
My stout hearties, former eager allies,
They raved at my specific—(D—— all these men!)—
Looked at each other with a wild surprise,
Went along to speak to Mister Austen.

Kee-Hoy.

ON FIRST HEARING CHRISTABEL SPEAK.

Much had I heard of women who uphold
Their rights and set aside the nation's laws,
Who gladly go to prison for their cause,
And suffer there indignities untold.
Oft had I thought 'twere easy work to mould
The will of woman and to clip her claws
Without enforcing on her prison laws,
Till I heard Christabel speak loud and bold.
Then felt I as a traveller must feel
When o'er his path an unknown race is cast,
Or Rip Van Winkle, when his eyes reveal
That twenty years in slumber have been passed.
I felt a sense of wonder o'er me steal,
As, listening, I looked and stood aghast!

Broken Gate.

THE HOBBLE SKIRT.

Much have I read in fashion books of old—
"Home Chat," "The Lady," and likewise
"The Queen"—
And many curious garbs and costumes seen,
Apparel strange, though cast in fashion's mould.
Oft of the hobble skirt had I been told,
Of girls with fettered limbs and air serene;
But never realised what it could mean
Till recently, the first I did behold.
Then laughed I like some patron of the "halls,"
When Harry Lauder clowns upon the stage,
Or, like stout Falstaff, when some jest befalls,
As may be read in Shakespeare's merriest page.
Alas, poor ladies! Fashion's pliant thralls
From days of fig leaves to our present age!

Tony.

THE EDITOR ON WAKING FROM A STATE OF COMA.

Much have I travelled over realms of old,
And many goodly books and pictures seen;
Round many a fancy island have I been,
And things most hard to swallow have been told.
Oft the secret to acquire gold
In realms where Pluto holds his sway serene;
Yet never did I breathe quite safe, I ween,
Till my subordinates speak, loud and bold.
Then feel I like the spider and the flies
When a new insect darts into his ken,
And, swiftly caught, is 'neath his eagle eyes.
Yet am I quite pacific in my den—
Look at my proof sheet with a mild surprise,
And silently re-speak the words of men.

Malignant.

AN ESTATE-AGENT ON THE LAND CLAUSES.

Much have I trafficked in the land for gold,
And many broad estates and deer-parks seen;
Round many country hamlets have I been
Which men, by fealty to their landlord, hold.
Oft of a wide expanse have I been told
'Twas by one landlord ruled as his demesne;
Yet never was disturbed his way serene,
Till he heard Lloyd-George speak out loud and bold;
But now his cup is full of bitterness,
When a new form is issued for his scan,
Or when, to know the full of his distress,
He looks at the Finance Act—and all his clan
Vie with each other in the Tory press,
Clamorous in the wake of Pretyman.

Mithra.

ON FIRST BOOKING WITH A CHAMPION ROAMER.

Much have I travelled, though without much gold,
And most suburban stations have I seen;
Round many an Inner Circle have I been,
Which barred the vision of Apollo bold.
Of more expensive journeys I'd been told,
Of purse-proud roamers of the air serene;
Yet so to travel I had not been keen
Until with Grahame-White the sky I strolled.
They call me now a patcher-up of lies,
What time I speak of things beyond their ken;
How I, like Crusoe, claimed with eager eyes
The world below; ideas—my fellow men
Look at each other with a mild surprise—
High-flown for such a sober citizen.

Aunt Jane.

ON FIRST SEEING THE WORD "DREADNOUGHT" IN A DAILY SHEET.

Much have I marvelled as in realms of gold
I've wandered and the "Daily Portion" seen.
Through many other papers I have been
Which plight their fealty to the Balfour fold.
Oft of one wide expanse have I been told
Which Chamberlain controlled as his demesne.
But suddenly appeared upon the scene
The word "Dreadnought," in letters large and bold.
Then felt I like some watcher of the sky
When some dread meteor swims into his ken.
"We mus thave four!" the blatant prophet cries.
But, all unknown to him and all his men,
The fleet is born, we learn with glad surprise:
To-day the seer is dumb as Darien.

Aspidistra.

My tired feet have the land of promise scoured,
And I have tramped for dollars all in vain,
Pleaded to stately dames love's claim;
And my fealty, denied, sickened and soured
In the realms of gold of Yankeeland.
Apollo, a rude old bard, mistrustful and inane,
Refused to aid me with a single strain;
He scowled, and on me his vindictive glances showered;
Then, prophetic-like, this cracked Celestial spoke:
"The dowered maidens for shady Europeans I keep,
For princes and peers whose fortunes are by gambling broke—
In praise of them my sweetest songs rich harvests reap."
I looked at the ancient wretch and my worst fears awoke,
And silent I sat down on a rock to weep.

Mary.

ON FIRST LOOKING INTO LLOYD GEORGE'S BUDGET.

To much I've listened in the days long past,
And Whigs and Tories patiently have heard
Speaking o'er British Islands—where the word
Loyalty to King and Throne can never last.
Now we are ruled by Socialists, held fast
To one idea, the "People," who will gird
The order that they sprang from, "Lower Herd,"
To some dark revolution—worlds to blast—
And 'tis a wonderment and sad surprise
That men like these, so base, can unaware
A nation's rooted principles, with lies
Uproot and rashly cast them anywhere.
Sowing another seed, with nothing wise,
Or right, or good, for Britain's fostering care.

Fata.

Much have I worried on my office stool,
And many weary schedules have I read,
But all I got was but a splitting head,
Which rendered me a most emphatic fool.
Oft of one Lloyd George have I been told,
He follows out his national trait with zest,
Yet, if a query given of his quest,
But apes the tender shepherd of a fold.
So feel I like a slaughtered lamb, and groan
As a fresh trouble swims into my den.
Form IV. has caused full many a heavy wan,
Now LL.I hits all us brewing men.
It is enough, I've scarcely strength to moan,
'Tis all beyond my wretched ken.

Sea Gull.

AFTER KEATS.

Much have I mused upon the realms of old,
And many goodly Statutes and kingdoms seen.
Road distant countries east and west I've been
Which to their Mother-land allegiance hold.
And oft of one expanse had I been told,
That fills the Northern West a great demesne;
But none inspired me from its pure serene
Till Chamberlain had spoken loud and bold.
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies,
When a new planet swims into his sight,
An added star, before his eagle eyes,
Drawn to the sun for harmony and light.
Hail, Afric's star, and Rhodes, who hailed its rise,
Then, silent, rested on Matoppo's height!

Snapshot.

ON FIRST OWNING AN AEROPLANE.

Much have I wobbled o'er the roads of old,
Upon all states and kinds of wheeled machine;
Round all the British islands have I been
At all times of the year, both hot and cold.
But through the skies' expanse of blue and gold
I now direct my monoplane serene,
And from above look down upon the scene,
Where dust the grovelling motors doth enfold.
Now feel I like a man who space defies,
As, planing far above the haunts of men,
I drive my way across the world, and rise
In eagle flight above the seas; or when,
Like daring Icarus, with wild surprise,
Silent I fall, then crash to earth again.

Saemund.

ON FIRST LISTENING TO L.G.'S HUMOUR.

Much am I trammelled amidst rolls of gold,
Have many "cash accounts" and ledgers seen.
Round many western coast-lines have I been,
Which bards in fealty to Ap-Lloyd do hold.
Oft of one Limehouse speech have I been told,
That deep Lloyd humour, rude as his demesne;
Yet never did I breathe its pure serene
Till I heard David speak out loud and bold.
Then felt I like some "Wot yer" of St. Bride's
When a new partner with his coin has gone;
And like Scotch daughters, when, with boggle eyes,
They stare at tips of sixpence, and call us "mon!"
Look at each other with a mild surprise,
So let I Honour speak in Credition!

Face.

MY FIRST VISIT TO ERIN.

Oft have I journey'd in the West Countree,
By cheap excursions many counties seen;
In Scilly linger'd and to Lundy been,
Unsung by poets, yet not barr'd to me.
But one sweet verdant spot I long'd to see.
Land of Home-Rulers, island ever green.
Yet, had I never breathed its air I ween,
Save for a kindly chap, a ticket free!
Then felt I like some watchman in the street
Whom lamps acetylene of motors blind;
Or like brave Peary who, with weary feet,
Sore from ice-travel—comrades left behind—
Shouting "Eureka" (as was only meet)
Swarm'd up the Pole it took so long to find.

Piers Penilles.

Much have I travelled in the realms of gold,
And many goodly captures have I seen.
In many strong rooms, burglar-proof, I've been,
Which I was well informed much "pelf" did hold.
Oft of one well-lined "crib" I had been told
Which, so 'twas said, to crack would not be vain;
Yet had I never tried to "lift" its "sheen,"
Till one rough night, when darkness did enfold
All things; then went I forth to claim my prize
With visions of retirement in my ken.
Retire I did—A "slop" with eagle eyes
Had twigged my game, and with two men
Embraced me as I left, and, in a trice
My wrists were steel-encircled once again.

Steeperton.

Much have I revelled in the joys of old,
And many splend'd "stars" and actors seen,
Round many West End theatres have I been
Which can't a candle to Apollo hold.
'Tis oft a great expense to me untold
That crowded "House," where business is immense;
Yet never did I feel inclined to scream
Until the "Follies" spoke out loud and bold.
Then felt I, so great was my delight,
Like some new person in another sphere;
For stout Pelissier, fooling every night,
Gives us fun terrific—never fear—
A show that is diverting, merry and bright,
And suitably rewarded with a cheer.

Iris.

Much have I grumbled upon quarter days,
And many heavy rates and taxes paid.
In many politic meetings have I strayed
Where philosophers deliver their speeches bold;
Oft of one-sided schemes have I been told
That deep land-owners ruled as their demesne;
Yet never did I feel the truth serene
Till I heard a Taffy speak, in accents cold.
Then I felt like some gazer of the skies
When aeroplones fly high o'er his head;
Or like the Kaiser when with "Dreadnought" eyes
He scans the seas, whilst rich land-owners
Stared at each other with silent surprise
Before "Form IV." from Downing Street.

Jakwyt.

I have trudged the earth in quest of precious oil,
And kingdoms and States with restless energy explored,
Till continents and islands, east and west, with admiration roared.
Apollo even tuned his lyre on every soil
To glorify Rockefeller's expanding fame.
Deep through the rocky crust I've bored,
And laid bare the realms of gold so long ignored—
The enchantment of a vast and magic hoard.
But wicked and malignant creatures rose,
Who looked upon my victories with greedy eyes.
The voice of despairing wrath my honest syndicates called foes;
My conscience, purified, is rent by saintly sighs;
But silent in my sanctuary of prayer the Lord of Hosts replies:
"Meekly bear the cross and be thankful for the blows"!

ENTRE NOUS.

THE contributions noted below have reached me during the past week for the Truth Toy Fund and the Tress Barry Fund. Both funds are still in urgent need of all the support my readers will be good enough to give, and I hope they will not defer their remittances until the calls of charity are drowned by the uproar of the general election. It would also be very welcome if contributors to the Toy Fund would spare a few extra sixpences for the Tress Barry Fund. There will be, as usual, 11,000 little paupers looking to this source for a new sixpence at Christmas, but the coins at present in hand are a very long way short of that number.

Will the numerous ladies who are so kindly dressing dolls for the Truth Toy Show note that if they are to be exhibited at the Albert Hall the dolls must reach Truth Office not later than December 7? The earlier they arrive the more convenient it will be to those who have the business of checking and classifying them. The names of the dressers should in all cases be put inside the boxes.

I have received from Mr. Edwin Douglas two framed artist's proofs of autotypes from his pictures, "Spring" and "Winter," which he kindly offers as prizes for the competitors in the Doll Show. This is a very handsome and welcome gift, and I have no doubt that the ultimate possessors of the pictures will appreciate it as highly as I do.

The King and Queen took up their residence at Windsor Castle on Saturday, and it is understood that this palace will in future be occupied by the Court for about four months in the year. The longest stay will be during the winter, and there will usually be visits at Easter and at Whitsuntide and during Ascot race week. Queen Victoria spent about three months of the year at Windsor, but during the last reign the three annual periods of residence of the Court at the Castle did not exceed five weeks altogether. King Edward greatly disliked Windsor Castle, and the place gave him a gêne unless there was a large party to keep things going briskly. His visits to the Castle during Queen Victoria's reign were principally associated with State ceremonials and entertainments, and when there was a quiet day her Majesty frequently arranged for a gloomy hour at the Frogmore Mausoleum or the Albert Memorial Chapel, or an inspection of the coffins in the Royal vault.

The King's shooting party this week in Windsor Great Park is the first which has taken place there since January last. The Royal domain is swarming with pheasants and ground game. His Majesty will have two shooting parties at Windsor in January, when a day is to be devoted to the Bagshot preserves. The shooting at Windsor was very much improved during the last reign. Queen Victoria took very little interest in the preserves, which would have been much neglected but for the vigilant care of Prince Christian.

The political crisis and the impending general election have somewhat altered the winter arrangements of the Court. The King and Queen are now expected to arrive at Buckingham Palace from Windsor Castle towards the end of next week, or on Monday, December 5. Their Majesties will stay in town until Monday, December 12, when they are going to Brocket Hall on a three days' visit to Lord and Lady Mount Stephen, and on Saturday, the 17th, they will proceed to Sandringham for Christmas. The King and Queen will return to Windsor at the beginning of January, and are then to be in residence at the Castle for about a month before coming up to Buckingham Palace for the season.

---

King George travelled one day last week to London from Sandringham only in order to facilitate the transaction of public affairs, and his Majesty showed more consideration for his Prime Minister than was ever displayed by Queen Victoria under similar circumstances. There was a Ministerial crisis in June, 1866, and another in June, 1885, and on both occasions her late Majesty was at Balmoral, where she insisted on remaining until the day originally fixed for her return south, to the great inconvenience of the party leaders concerned. The Queen's delay caused much complication in Parliamentary business and generally in the course of public affairs.

---

It was originally arranged for Queen Alexandra to return to Sandringham on the 10th, but her Majesty very much dislikes leaving Buckingham Palace, and she postponed her departure from town for nearly a fortnight. Queen Alexandra did not, therefore, arrive at Sandringham until after the departure of their Majesties from Windsor, and the Queen of Norway had been at Appleton for ten days before her mother followed her into Norfolk.

---

Prince Arthur of Connaught, who is stationed at York with his regiment, the Royal Scots Greys, has been on a visit to Mrs. Arthur Wilson at Tranby Croft. H.R.H. is to pay visits during the next few weeks to Lord and Lady Zetland at Aske Hall, to Florence Lady Nunburnholme at Warter Priory, and to Lord Wenlock at Escrick Park.

---

Princess Henry of Battenberg was last week on a visit to Lord and Lady Normanton at Sowerby Park, near Ringwood. The house at Sowerby is beautifully situated on the banks of the Avon, and the surrounding woods are very picturesque. The place is noted for its splendid collection of pictures, which includes several of the finest of the works of Sir Joshua Reynolds and some noble portraits by Gainsborough, Romney, and Van Dyck. There are also several very choice examples of the Old Masters. The gallery contains a remarkable portrait of Lady Jane Grey, which is attributed to Holbein.

---

Princess Victor of Hohenlohe-Langenburg has returned to her apartments in St. James's Palace from Norton Manor, near Taunton, where she had been residing for several months.

---

Princess Louis of Battenberg has arrived in London from Darmstadt. She has been residing for several months at the Château of Heiligenberg.

---

Several daily and weekly papers have lately stated, in reference to the marriage of Princess Clémentine of Belgium, that Prince Victor Napoleon "will ultimately inherit the greater part of the Empress Eugénie's fortune." This is a pure conjecture, for the Empress Eugénie's fortune is absolutely at her own disposal, and it is far more likely that it will pass to hre own relations, especially as Princess Clémentine is enormously rich. The Empress Eugénie must be rather amused at the frequent speculations as to the disposal of her fortune. It is not so long since it was being constantly announced that Princess Henry of Battenberg and the Queen of Spain would be her principal heirs.

A paragraph is going round the papers which states that King Manuel "has decided to purchase an ancestral home in England," and that he "is very anxious indeed to be present at the Coronation," which is probably a pure fiction. King Manuel has no idea of purchasing a residence in England, and it is not likely that he will make a settlement in any country for some years to come.....If the ex-King of Portugal has really expressed a wish to be present at the Coronation it will be an imperative necessity for him to be privately informed (to prevent official interference) that his attendance on that occasion is absolutely out of the question. It has never been the custom for exiled Royalties to attend State ceremonials in any country whatever and their presence would lead to vexatious tracasseries of all kinds. I am told that Queen Amélie and the Comtesse de Paris are much annoyed at the nonsensical inventions about King Manuel's doings and intentions which have appeared in the press during the last month.

A number of houses in Park Street, Windsor, have been recently purchased by the Crown, and they have since been demolished by the Office of Works, in order to make room for an extensive motor garage for Windsor Castle and for residences for some of the Royal servants. It is intended to pull down all the houses on the left side of Park Street as soon as the leases fall in, and to cover the space with buildings connected with the Castle establishment. The left side of Park Street extends from the Royal Mews to the Long Walk gates, and it is strange that the ground occupied by these houses was not always included within the precincts of the Castle.

The King has appointed Sir Seymour Fortescue to be Serjeant-at-Arms in the House of Lords. This office was held for about nine years by the late Sir Fleetwood Edwards, who was succeeded last August by Sir Stanley Clarke, who has now vacated it. It is understood that the King had sanctioned an exchange of offices between Sir Fleetwood Edwards and Sir Stanley Clarke, who has been for some years Paymaster of the Household, but apparently the arrangement is not to be completed. The salary is £1,000 a year.

Sir Seymour Fortescue is very popular in society, and his appointment to this office has given much satisfaction in many circles. He is a younger brother of Lord Fortescue, and he was an Equerry-in-Ordinary to King Edward for seventeen years, and was frequently in attendance when his late Majesty was abroad. Sir Seymour Fortescue was in the Royal Navy for over thirty years, and he saw service in Egypt during the campaign of 1882, and also during the South African War. He was a great favourite with King Edward, and enjoyed his full confidence.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

The coming together of Christmas and a general election is a very acute case of "It never rains but it pours." A general election is not only a politician's job, but is intrusive as Paul Pry—only more aggressively so—into everyone's private life; no one escapes, not even those whose "sober wishes" have never learned to stray, from the "cool sequestered" ways of life. The blast of war brings disturbance and dislocation not only of social, but of family and all kinds of arrangements. Nevertheless, Dublin is, perhaps, the quietest place in the United Kingdom—and has been for the last quarter of a century, at least—during general elections. The capital shows no signs of political excitement; all who wish for a place of calm in a storm should come and make a stay here, strange though the idea may seem on the other side of the water.

Last week Lord Aberdeen dined with the Incorporated Law Society, and made a speech in reply to the old conventional toast of "The Lord Lieutenant and the Prosperity of Ireland." The origin of this "toast" is as hard to discover as the connection between the Lord Lieutenant—any Lord Lieutenant—and the prosperity of Ireland. Throughout the Victorian era the Irish Viceroys have mostly been superior officials, and friendly, so far as party exigencies permitted, to the country. In the old days, when Dublin Castle and the Mansion House were on visiting terms, the Lord Mayor entertained the Lord Lieutenant annually at a State banquet, on which occasion much was made of the Lord Lieutenant's reply to the toast of Irish prosperity coupled with his name. The speech was in the nature of an important official pronouncement; statistics were given regarding the progress and prosperity of the country, which statistics—after the manner of such things—had an almost invariable habit of presenting themselves in a pleasantly post-prandial, rosy light. More than a quarter of a century has passed since there has been any interchange of hospitalities between the Lord Lieutenant and the Lord Mayor, and the annual viceregal official speech has fallen into disuse, since "They don't be dinin' one another anny more," as they say over here. Last week, amongst the shooting parties in the country was one at Lord and Lady Rossmore's family residence in Monaghan. The Westenras have always been a great riding and sporting family. The Duchess of Newcastle no doubt inherits her hunting tastes from her mother, who is the sister of Lord Rossmore. Mr. and Lady Muriel Close had a party at Drumbanagher, also in the North. Amongst their guests were Lord and Lady Roden, Lord and Lady Dunsany, and Major and Lady Emily Humphreys.

The slack season has brought about a number of marriages in Ireland, and marriage engagements, though they can hardly be counted a case of the usually dreaded results of "idle hands." General May's daughter was married in Dublin last week. Her grandfather, Lord Chief Justice May, was Lord Morris's immediate predecessor in that office in Ireland. Marriages yet to come are those of the daughters of Sir John Nutting and Sir Frederick Shaw. The last-named is alluded to by Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, in relation to his own genealogy, as the "nebulous baronet," floating about somewhere in the family. Sir F. Shaw is, however, by no means "nebulous," and lives in the handsome family residence, Bushy Park, a few miles from Dublin. The well-known Miss Flora Shaw—now Lady Lugard—is his cousin.

The Dowager Lady St. Levan, who died on Friday, was a sister of the late Lord Townshend and of Lady Audrey Buller. She was married in 1856 to Sir John Aubyn, who was raised to the peerage in 1887, when he had been for twenty-nine years one of the members for Cornwall. Lady St. Levan actively assisted her husband in his political, philanthropic, social, and estate affairs of all kinds. She was greatly beloved in West Cornwall, not only for her munificent charities, but also for her unfailing kindness and sympathy. She was a true grande dame, and both in town and in country she was always a most charming hostess. "Lady Elizabeth" will be deeply mourned by all classes in West Cornwall, especially by the poor.

A well-known writer thus referred to a visit to the late Lord and Lady St. Levan at St. Michael's Mount: "Nothing can exceed the extreme kindness and genuine hospitality of Lord and Lady St. Levan. I think I never saw such excellent people or a happier and more united family, and, being very well off, their kindness to rich and poor cannot be calculated. It is indeed the most delightful of homes."

---

Mr. G. E. Romanes, who died last week at Colorado Springs, was the son of the late Dr. George John Romanes. He was owner of the estate of Pitcalzean, in Ross-shire, and he was very popular in the county and took an active interest in local affairs. He was a familiar figure in the Cromarty district.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon and Lady Helen Gordon-Lennox have arrived in town from Gordon Castle, where they had been residing since the beginning of August. They will return to Gordon Castle early next month until after the Christmas holidays, when they will proceed to Goodwood for a lengthened stay.

The Duke and Duchess of Bedford have returned to Woburn Abbey for the winter from Cairnsmore House, a very pretty place near Newton Stewart, which the Duke has rented for many years past, along with extensive shootings.

---

The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk are returning this week to Arundel Castle for the winter. They have been staying at Derwent Hall, their shooting lodge in North Derbyshire, since they left Scotland.

---

A record woodcock bag for Scotland has been obtained on the Fasnakyle shootings, which are in the Glenaffric district of Inverness-shire, on the Chisholme estate, and rented by Colonel Clarke. The party of four guns killed 147 woodcock in three days. These birds are unusually plentiful in the Highlands this winter.

THE IMPENDING ELECTION.

I.—From the Shop-keeper's Point of View.

You've fairly spoiled my Christmas trade,
My till I'd hoped of tin full;
Now scarce a copper will be made,
I call it downright sinful.

The Liberals say it's all the Peers,
Who've forced it on the nation;
The Tories speak, with bitter jeers,
Of Redmond's proud dictation.

These cavils matter not to me;
I am concerned with neither—
Whether the Lords in fault may be,
Or those d——d Commons, either.

I only know this silly game
Me o. my profits chouses;
And so with Shakespeare I exclaim,
"A plague on both your Houses."

The Bank of New Zealand, which is virtually a Government institution, cuts anything but a creditable figure in a case recently investigated by a Parliamentary Committee at Wellington. Captain Hamilton, the owner of an extensive property known as the Mangatoro Run, mortgaged it to the bank for loans (at 8 per cent. per annum) which by 1889 amounted to £68,000. That was a year of financial stringency in the colony, and on Captain Hamilton's failure to meet a demand for the repayment of the loans the bank obtained an order for the sale of the property. The scarcity of money and the serious depression of pastoral property at the moment, combined with the condition "cash within one month," made the forced sale a farce, and the property was knocked down to the bank for £5,000, a mere fraction of its real value.

Immediately afterwards the Legislature passed an Act, introduced as a private Bill, which empowered the bank to purchase and hold land sold under a mortgage. The Act was made retrospective, thereby validating the purchase and seizure of Captain Hamilton's property and depriving him of the legal remedy he would otherwise have possessed. Less than a year after the purchase for £5,000 the property was transferred to the Bank of New Zealand Estates Company for £139,000, and on the whole transaction the bank, after recouping itself the principal and interest due from Captain Hamilton, netted a profit of something like £200,000. Captain Hamilton was ruined, and now after the lapse of twenty years a Parliamentary Committee has at last expressed the opinion that he suffered a serious wrong, and recommended his claim for redress to the favourable consideration of the Government.

In broad outline at least this case bears a resemblance to the scandalous treatment of Mr. Joshua Jones in connection with the Mokau estate—a matter long familiar to my readers, and now also before a Committee of the New Zealand Parliament. For the credit of the Dominion it is to be hoped that in both cases Parliament will rectify the injustice that has been done, or otherwise a very bad impression will be created in the minds of investors in this country with interests in New Zealand.

A Commission appointed by the Governor of the Straits Settlements has recommended the abolition of the representative system of municipal government at Singapore in consequence of the corruption and inefficiency which a recent inquiry revealed. The Straits Times anticipates that this will be regarded at the Colonial Office as a retrograde step. Possibly, but it is to be hoped that no sentimental consideration will be allowed to prevent the adoption of the drastic course proposed by the Commission. The system has proved a lamentable failure, and, as the Singapore journal shows, local conditions make it most improbable that it will ever work well in that island. In the place of the existing municipal body, partly elected and partly nominated, it is proposed that there should be an advisory board appointed by the Governor, which, while exercising a certain general supervision, would not be concerned with the actual details of the administration, and would not be allowed to interfere with the routine duties of the official staff.

High officials of the Singapore Municipality were implicated in the charges of corruption dealt with in the report, and, as is evident from letters that I have received, the local community is much exercised over the question whether these individuals are to be prosecuted. Some time ago a minor official was prosecuted and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment for an offence far less heinous than those of which some of his superiors are accused. For years past these gentry appear to have been feathering their nests at the expense of the ratepayers, and it will be a gross scandal if they are not brought to book.

THE IMPENDING ELECTION.

II.—From the Point of View of the average M.P. of either Party.

We're going to the Country, and of course we're coming in,
(It's a rotten, dear amusement, and costs no end of tin);
Our hearts are full of confidence, our spirits light as air,
Our party's sure of victory (I wish to Heaven it were).

We're going to the Country, and we'll sit upon our foes,
(But these general elections are uncertain sort of shows);
We'll teach our foes a lesson. They will get their fingers burnt.
We're going to the Country (and I wish to Heaven we weren't).

The Times of last Thursday contained a notice of the recently published memoir of Lady John Russell, in which there was a very curious reference to her husband. It is stated that "till 1861 he remained a Commoner, sometimes as leader of the Liberal party (he was for a short time Prime Minister in 1845) and sometimes as second to Palmerston." Lord John Russell was never Prime Minister in 1845, but he held that office from June, 1846, until March, 1852. He was leader of the "Liberal" party in the House of Commons from 1834 (when he succeeded Lord Althorp, who had gone to the House of Lords) until 1854; Lord Palmerston became leader of the House of Commons when he was appointed Prime Minister in January, 1855. Lord John Russell did not figure prominently between 1854 and 1859, when he became Foreign Secretary under Lord Palmerston, who would very much have preferred to reappoint Lord Clarendon. Lord John was usually described by his political friends as "Ivan Ivanovitch."

Count Tolstoy was a sort of Hebrew prophet born out of due time. In a more primitive age he would probably have tramped about Europe preaching to the multitudes, have founded a new church, possibly have obtained a martyr's crown, after which he would have been canonised in succeeding ages as a saint, or worshipped as a divinity. As it was, he preached to mankind in novels and pamphlets. By such means he reached a wider audience, but also a less impressionable one. The Russian peasantry, whom he loved with a Christ-like love, and who either knew him in person or by reports which magnified his attributes, regarded him with a veneration akin to worship. The "governing classes," and the world of pleasure-seekers and money-makers, for whom his preaching was mainly intended, regarded him here and there with sympathy, but mostly with the curiosity inspired by a freak, and went on with their governing, their pleasure-seeking, and their money-making as before. That he has set many men and women thinking in all parts of the world who are not usually given to thinking is doubtless true, and so far he has exercised a real influence upon his contemporaries. But that he has made or will make any permanent mark upon the world proportionate to the attention that he has attracted during his life is highly improbable.

One reason for this is that Tolstoy neither taught nor attempted to teach anything new. The substance of all that he had to say had been said much more effectively in Judæa nineteen hundred years ago. He frankly sought to win Christendom back to the observance of the ethical principles which every Christian professes to accept. But this, if it can ever be done at all, is not to be done by books alone. If a doctrine is to influence men's conduct to any considerable extent, something in the nature of a church seems necessary to bind them to its observance, and to co-operation in spreading and enforcing it. To put it in familiar language, a "movement" must be "organised."

---

William Penn laboured in much the same direction as Tolstoy. His personality was less striking, his intellectual gifts less powerful, but he had a more practical mind; he founded his society and he made a mark on the world which is still visible. With a doctrinal message infinitely less attractive, but a still greater capacity for organisation and "missionary" work, General Booth has influenced his contemporaries more effectively than either of them, and in some form or other his work may possibly last for some generations. One might illustrate this point further by the example of St. Paul and the work which he did towards the Christianisation of the Roman Empire. But I can recall no case in which a process of "conversion" has been effected to any considerable extent by merely reading books—least of all novels.

Some sensation has been excited among University reformers at Oxford by the publication there of an opinion of Mr. Buckmaster (the University Counsel) that the proposed alterations in the Hebdomadal Council and in Congregation can be carried out by an Order of the King in Council, but that a private Act of Parliament will be required for "the proposals as to measures passing Congregation without a division, or not being rejected by Convocation by a prescribed majority ipso facto becoming law." It would not now be possible to get any such Act passed before 1912.

Principal Stewart, of St. Andrews, is to be the Moderator of the next General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, which meets at Edinburgh about the middle of May. Dr. Stewart, who was educated at St. Andrews under Principal Tulloch, had a most distinguished University career in classics and mental philosophy, and was described by A. K. H. B. as "the Admirable Crichton." In 1887, after about seventeen years of successful parish work (during which he earned a high reputation as an eloquent preacher), he was appointed Professor of Systematic Theology at St. Andrews, and in 1894 he succeeded Dr. Cunninghame as Principal of St. Mary's College, on the nomination of Lord Rosebery. He is a very able man all round, and is regarded in Scotland as thoroughly practical and judicious.

Archdeacon Wynne, Rector of St. Michael's, Limerick, has resigned his preferment owing to age and infirmity. He has been in Orders for close upon half a century. He was Donnellan Lecturer in the University of Dublin eleven years ago, and he is considered to be one of the most distinguished theologians of the Irish Church and a very able writer on devotional subjects. Many of his works have achieved great popularity.

---

Mr. W. Kirby, whose death was announced last week, had been for thirty-four years Bursar of Winchester College, and since 1883 he had been steward of the College estates. He took a most active part in all local affairs, and he had been for many years a popular and influential leader of the Winchester Tories. Mr. Kirby, who had a high reputation as a learned antiquary, gained many distinctions, both at Eton and at Cambridge, and he was for five years fellow and tutor of Trinity College during the mastership of Dr. Whewell. He was called to the Bar in 1866, and practised for some years as a conveyancer and equity draughtsman. He was one of the principal founders of the New University Club, and was for many years chairman of the committee.

Dr. Ince was appointed to the Regius Chair of Divinity by Lord Beaconsfield in 1878. He was an undergraduate of Lincoln College, and for many years fellow, tutor, and sub-Rector of Exeter. He was a very popular don, and while at Exeter he earned a great reputation as a successful college tutor and an admirable preacher. His promotion to the Divinity Chair was considerably criticised, as he was unknown as a writer, and he could not be described as a learned theologian. The appointment was attributed at the time to the influence of Lord Cranbrook, who was said to have previously urged the strong claims of Dean Burgon. Dr. Ince was a Tory of the old school, and he regarded theological questions in the same spirit as politics, having no liking for the new criticism and similar innovations. He did good service to Christ Church in many ways, and he was a generous benefactor to the cathedral.

The Regius Professorship of Divinity is worth £1,500 a year, with residence, a canonry of Christ Church being annexed to the Chair. This post has been held during the last century by several divines of the highest distinction, including Archbishop Howley, Bishop Lloyd (the intimate friend of Sir Robert Peel), Bishop Hampden, and Bishop Jacobson. Dr. Ince's predecessor was Dr. J. B. Mozley, a man of superlative ability, whose famous University sermons find a place in most theological libraries. He was a close friend of Dean Church and a younger brother of the well-known "Tom" Mozley (author of "Reminiscences of Oriel"), who was for forty years one of the principal leader-writers of the Times. When Mr. Gladstone's public life was drawing to a close, he told a friend of mine that of all the Church appointments he had made the one which he regarded with the most unqualified satisfaction was that of Dr. Mozley to the Regius Chair of Divinity. He held the post for only a few years, and his death (at the age of sixty-four) was a very great loss to the Church of England.

Oxford Convocation has presented the Rev. Arthur H. Wright, New College, to the rectory of Brockley, Somersetshire. The living is in the gift of Mr. Smyth Pigott, of Brockley Hall, but he is a Roman Catholic, so the patronage of this and other benefices has passed to the University. The stipend is about £100 a year, but there is an excellent residence and an interesting church, while the parish (in which there are some fine woodland scenes) is a very small one. The living became vacant by the preferment of the late rector, who also held the adjoining parish of Chelvey. The arrangement of one clergyman holding two neighbouring livings, so much favoured by some of the bishops, does not work well. Unless the incumbent keeps a curate the parish in which he himself does not reside is certain to be neglected.

The Vicar of Marlow has been enlightening his parishioners in his parish magazine upon a new disease. He calls it "Morbus Sabbaticus," and it would appear to be an intermittent fever with well-marked periodicity. Those attacked show no symptoms from Monday morning until Saturday night. The patient sleeps well on Saturday night and eats a hearty breakfast on Sunday; about 10.30 a.m. he shows signs of disinclination to exert himself, and rapidly passes into a state of complete inertia. This passes away about 12.30; the patient recovers his appetite and eats a hearty meal. In the evening, however, a relapse takes place; the symptoms develop with alarming rapidity, and not until 8 p.m. is recovery complete. The worthy rector prescribes as the best cure regular attendance at church on Sundays, but this remedy is very likely, I imagine, to produce an attack. It is not the going to the doctor's shop which cures a patient, but the medicine and advice he gets there.

Lady Juliet Duff, as President of the Charing Cross Hospital Appeal Committee, has set herself the difficult task of raising £100,000 to free that institution from debt and to enable the wards now closed to be re-opened. There are many demands upon the benevolence of the public at this season of the year, but the Charing Cross Hospital has very strong claims to support, and this appeal ought to receive a generous response. Donations may be sent to Lady Duff either at the hospital or at 51, Portland Place, W.

Major-General Sir Percy Lake, who has just vacated his post as Inspector-General of the Canadian Militia, has been appointed a Divisional Commandant in India, to replace General Sir James Willcocks, and he goes to Meerut. This appointment is said to have been made on the recommendation of Lord Kitchener.

Major Ferrar, late Royal Horse Artillery, is to succeed Colonel Tollmer as Inspector of Remounts for the Royal Artillery, the appointment dating from Friday next. Major Ferrar has for some time held a post in the Western District.

---

I hear that since the last reference in TRUTH, some three months back, to the question of officers' railway fares in India, a memorandum has been circulated explaining that though the Commander-in-Chief desires that the privilege of travelling first-class at second-class fares should be conceded to officers, he has been overruled by the Railway Board. This is only one example among many of the small tenderness which the civilian element in India displays towards the Army, but for which the whole civil population would immediately be running for their lives. It was stated in a recent article in the Bombay Gazette that under normal traffic conditions the first-class coaches on Indian railways run more or less empty. This statement is confirmed from another quarter, and it points to the conclusion that the railways would gain rather than lose by the concession for which the Army is asking.

---

Another good point is made in the article just referred to, namely, that in all the principal European countries outside the United Kingdom officers of the Army enjoy special privileges on the railways. Even in this country railway companies grant such privileges to the rank and file, and to the Navy also. Considering that in India the railway system is now practically in the hands of the State, considering, too, that India is a military State in a fuller sense than any other country in the world—for the whole fabric of government rests upon the Army—it is incomprehensible that the Indian Government should not treat its officers as favourably as the Governments of France or Germany. At any rate, either in meal or malt, it will have to do something for them before long, for the complaint of general inability to make the two ends meet is growing in extent and intensity, and the results of the present state of things are becoming more and more evident.

---

Owing to the blundering of some one in the Adjutant-General's department the so-called King's Pardon is being made the subject of flouts and jeers in every officers' mess and soldiers' canteen. Army Order 129 limited the pardon to soldiers who had deserted under Section 12 of the Army Act, or had fraudulently enlisted under Section 13, thus excluding the cases of men who came under Section 32 for re-enlisting after having been discharged from the Army for misconduct, and under Section 33 for making a false answer on attestation. The omission to do this has led to some ridiculous anomalies.

When the Army Order was published many offenders under sections 32 and 33, not being learned in military law, gave themselves up under the belief that they were entitled to benefit by the pardon from which the Army Order excluded them. Not wishing to punish men for falling into a trap, the Army Council have ruled that all men who have confessed under misapprehension should in no way suffer by their confession, but be allowed to go on serving on their present engagement. I don't find fault with this ruling, but what about the men who were pardoned and at the same time penalised by losing all previous service, proficiency pay, and medals which they won in the field?

Take the case of the non-commissioned officer of whom I wrote in TRUTH of the 2nd of November. Although pardoned, he has to start again as a recruit after nine and a-half years' good service, with a debt of £9 or more to make up, and with the loss of the medal gained at Spion Kop; while another man who re-enlisted after being discharged with ignominy from the Army is allowed to go scot free without forfeiting any service or refunding any pay. The thing is absurd, and it ought to be put right by removing the penalties which have made a farce of what was intended by his Majesty to be an act of clemency.

---

With reference to the recent statement in TRUTH as to warrant officers being given commissions in the Indian Army Departments without being in possession of a first-class certificate of education, a correspondent writes:—

> I believe I am correct in saying there are not five first-class certificates among the whole of the Departmental officers with honorary commissions, and not 5 per cent. of the warrant officers possess them.

If this is so, I think it is time the Commander-in-Chief in India looked into the matter, for if the possession of a first-class certificate of education is exacted in the case of regimental warrant officers it strikes me that the same rule should apply to departmental warrant officers, and à fortiori to those who are given honorary commissions as officers, of whom there are some 125 or more in the Indian Army.

---

Here is a little grievance from Malta with a genuine air about it. Some boys belonging to soldiers' families in one of the forts were recently caught stealing soldiers' clothing, money, etc., such thefts having gone on for some time past. What has been done to them does not appear, but the gunners whom they have been robbing have been promptly punished, as extra orderlies have been put on duty in the barrack-rooms—which practically means confined there—in order to enforce an order that no children shall enter the rooms. It seems that one of the families to which the thieves belong has lost the mother and the other the father, and in both cases the surviving parent has refused an opportunity which was given of sending the children to a school. It might be to the advantage of the children, therefore, as well as the troops, if these families were turned out of their quarters.

---

Among many letters received lately on the subject of the treatment of troops at sea, one of the most interesting is from a correspondent who has had twenty years' experience of the mercantile marine, and in the course of it has served in Army transports. He makes two points worth notice: first, that the treatment of soldiers and their families is in several respects inferior to that of emigrants; and, secondly, that the fault lies in a great measure with the military authorities, who seem to be paralysed by red-tape and frequently obstruct arrangements proposed by the shipping company, or their servants, for the benefit of the men, merely because they are bound, or think they are bound, by some Service regulation or tradition. In the matter of food and water particularly, says this witness, much more might be done for the comfort of the troops if the regulations were overhauled and if the staff of the transport department would exercise a little more common-sense and consideration for the men they have to look after. The truth is that the whole subject wants thoroughly looking into by a committee of inquiry, on which the War Office element should be largely leavened by outsiders familiar with the business of providing for large numbers of passengers on board ship.

---

Captain H. A. Fyler was gazetted a few days ago to the Andromeda, "for charge of a group of ships in the Fourth Division of the Home Fleet at Devonport." The principle of appointing a captain to the command of a group of ships in the Fourth Division of the Home Fleet is criticised as the usurpation of a flag officer's job. The contention is that the proportion of admirals is so greatly in excess of the number of flag posts to be filled that it is neither desirable nor fair to curtail their legitimate chances of employment. All the warships in the particular groups referred to are battleships and cruisers, and would constitute captains' commands on being completed from nucleus to full complement. I suppose economy is at the bottom of this principle of employing junior ranks, for there is no lack of eligible flag-officers on the half-pay list.

---

It is gratifying to find one's views of naval strategy approved in Whitehall. It was mentioned in TRUTH a few weeks ago that the Fifth Destroyer Flotilla had been officially notified to prepare for early permanent transference from Devonport to Harwich. This would have left the western arsenal with only a few obsolete torpedo boats and a flotilla of the earlier submarines, a far from adequate force for the protection of Plymouth Sound and the Hamoaze. I ventured to suggest that as the destruction of Devonport Dockyard would be of much greater advantage to an enemy than the reduction of Lowestoft or Felixstowe, the change was a strategic error. The Admiralty seem to have come to the same conclusion on second thoughts, for they have now countermanded the order, and the new moorings which have been laid out in Harwich Harbour for the Fifth Flotilla will be used instead by the Third Flotilla, at present stationed at the Nore.

When the Lion was launched in August last a very competent authority told me that she represented the absolute limit of displacement and dimensions as set by the docking accommodation of the naval yards. Last week it was announced in the press that the Admiralty were inviting tenders for an armoured cruiser of greater gun-power and speed than anything yet designed. These are the two features which would make the greatest demand upon increased tonnage. It is no doubt correct that the Admiralty are inviting tenders for the three big armoured ships of the current programme which are to be built by private contract. Probably one of these will be a battleship-cruiser. But as there can be no authority for statements in regard to details, which are secrets jealously guarded, I am disposed to believe that my informant above mentioned was right, and that there will be no advance on the dimensions of the Lion, at any rate until the necessary new docking accommodation has been provided.

---

Last week a signal boy of H.M.S. Carnarvon, bearing the historic name of Churchill, "cheeked" the yeoman of signals, and was reported to the skipper. Captain Sclater ordered him to receive the maximum flogging—twelve cuts with the very formidable sort of cane which a ship's corporal is permitted to wield. The boy—who must be less than eighteen years of age, otherwise he could not be thus punished—let himself go again and struck the yeoman of signals with his fist on the left ear. I should have thought that, in view of the severity of the punishment he had received, Churchill's account with his superior officers was pretty fairly balanced, but Captain Sclater thought differently. He brought the boy to a court-martial. He himself prosecuted. He did his job conscientiously, giving the boy an "indifferent," not a "bad," character, and Churchill was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and dismissal from the Service.

---

Is it not time that this sort of quasi-judicial ferocity was curbed? The Home Secretary is even now investigating the management of the Akbar Reformatory, against which popular opinion has been inflamed by revelations of floggings no worse, apparently, than that to which this boy Churchill was sentenced. But the parrot cry that discipline must be maintained is still allowed in the Navy to justify savagery which has long since been discontinued in every other walk of life. No boy under eighteen can be pronounced irreclaimably bad, and sailors ought to be able to manage him and make something of him if anybody can. Why should they be allowed to send him back to civil life with his character damned so black that there is little prospect before him but a criminal career—and this at a time when the State on its civil side is doing everything in its power for the reclamation of juvenile criminals?

The result of the Bedford court-martial was pretty well a foregone conclusion, except as regards the sentences. In this respect the precedent of the Montagu seems to have been followed, except that the absurd formality of dismissing officers from a wrecked ship was dropped. Much sympathy is felt with Captain Edward Fitzherbert, who is not very likely to be employed again. He is a popular officer with a distinguished record. One particularly plucky episode stands to his credit. When serving as a lieutenant in the Algerine he was sent away in command of two boats to chase a slave dhow. This vessel made for the beach, maintaining a running fire, and the Arabs and the slaves landed. Both the boats were capsized in the surf, and all the arms lost save one rifle and four revolvers. Lieutenant Fitzherbert rallied his dripping detachment, and with these weapons started in pursuit, recovering twenty-seven slaves before being outrun, and destroying the dhow.

Three submarines of the Portsmouth flotilla are shortly to be detached and sent to Hong Kong. This piece of intelligence has naturally aroused curiosity in naval circles, for heretofore all our submarines have been in home waters. Why Hong Kong should be regarded as the most suitable place to make a beginning with foreign submarine service it is difficult to imagine, unless the Admiralty consider that these elusive craft are especially suited to hunting for pirates, which I believe are still to be found in the Yellow Sea. In that case why not make a beginning in the Persian Gulf against gun-runners?

In a paragraph which appeared in TRUTH a fortnight ago it was said to be regarded as certain that the Swiftsure and Triumph will shortly be transferred from the Home Fleet to the Mediterranean Fleet. So many Service readers have written and are still writing to enlighten me as to the present stations of these two ships that I feel some public acknowledgment of their kindness is called for. They have none of them, however, quite divined the true state of the case, which, I should have thought, was sufficiently obvious, namely, that the pen—as the best pens will do occasionally—wrote the exact opposite of what the writer intended to say. I am grateful for this aberration, for it is pleasant to know how attentively TRUTH is studied in the ward-room, but I should like, if possible, to spare any more officers the trouble of writing on this subject.

I am told in this connection that the Swiftsure and Triumph, having been originally built for the Chilian Navy, have always exercised the minds of the naval authorities owing to their inability to conform to the prevailing cult of "homogeneity" in squadrons. It is now proposed to get rid of further trouble on this score by bringing them home and putting them into the unclassed divisions of the Home Fleet, which was what was intended to be conveyed by the paragraph above referred to.

TO LORD LANSDOWNE.

(On the opening of Parliament.)

Last year, my Lord, a generous host
(It is but twelve months syne),
You had a Budget served on toast
And asked your friends to dine.

This year you set them, for a change,
To Commons hard and dry,
And, half-warmed from your kitchen range,
A very humble pie.

Next year, perhaps, still harder pressed
(Who knows what won't befall?)
There may be many a noble guest
You won't invite at all.

The Post Office has its shortcomings, but, after all, it generally comes out first in cheapness and efficiency when competition makes a comparison possible. Here is a case in point. A typewriter-carriage, weighing an ounce or so over 10 lbs., was sent by parcel post from Southampton to a town in the Midlands. The postage was elevenpence, and the parcel was delivered within twenty-four hours. The same parcel was afterwards returned by rail, "carriage forward." This time it was three days on the journey and the railway company's charge was 1s. 8d. Yet some people harbour the delusion that private commercial undertakings can be depended upon to work better than a Government Department.

A further step in the control of employment agencies in the metropolis will be reached on December 2, when under its newly acquired powers the London County Council will sit to license all employment agencies, whether for male employees or female. Registration did much to protect the public and to stamp out the fraudulent agent, but experience showed that it was not in itself sufficient to eliminate the agent who could cloak his shady practices with a proportion of genuine business. Under the new system it will be within the power of the Council to refuse a licence either to agents whose practices are questionable or whose characters will not bear investigation. The reform is one which has frequently been advocated in TRUTH as the only means of stamping out the fee-snatcher, and I should like to see the same powers extended to cover all agencies, such as those of the paying-guest type, which make a rich harvest out of their necessitous clients.

Only last week I referred to the demand from employers for students of the International Correspondence Schools as striking evidence of the success of the schools' methods and training. A further tribute to the status the undertaking is getting in the world of technical education was afforded on Thursday afternoon when a large number of the members of the councils of the leading learned, scientific, and trade societies were received by Lord and Lady Bessborough at the schools' headquarters in Kingsway, with the object of making themselves personally acquainted with the method of tuition adopted. Having "personally recommended" the "I.C.S." to numerous readers, I am gratified to see the progress they are making.

The R.S.P.C.A. is such a useful organisation that I hesitate to find fault with it, but one of its recent prosecutions under the Wild Birds' Protection Acts certainly seems to have been ill-advised. The defendant was summoned at Lambeth for having had in his possession on October 22 certain goldfinches "recently taken." It was shown that the birds must have been in captivity prior to September 10, on which date they were purchased by the defendant at Thetford; but the society's solicitor boldly contended that the words "recently taken" in the Acts should be construed to mean within a period of six months. In dismissing the case, the magistrate characterised this as an outrageous suggestion, and I am disposed to agree with him.

The curtain was rung down last week, at Salisbury County Police Court, on the last act of the military farce at Winterbourne Stoke, in which Captain Bennet-Stanford played the principal part. The final situation provided a very tame ending, however. The gallant Captain did not make his appearance to prosecute the Salisbury Town Councillor whom he sent back to his native town under arrest, but sent his solicitor to withdraw the summons. The magistrates allowed this course to be adopted, after perusing a letter which set out an agreement between the parties whereby the Captain paid the Councillor £25 and his costs as a solatium to his wounded dignity. Taken all round, Captain Bennet-Stanford must have found his manœuvres rather expensive.

The protests raised against the action of the Coroner of North Hants in appointing his son as deputy-coroner in the place of a resident of Aldershot have resulted in the Hampshire County Council deciding to form a new district for Aldershot, Farnborough, Fleet, Crookham, and Yateley. This course will effectively prevent the nuisance of having both the coroner and his deputy residing forty miles away from one of the principal scenes of their labours, and incidentally it will also serve to make clear to the coroner that the public interest should outweigh personal considerations in the making of public appointments.

A fine of £5 and costs for ill-treating two decrepit horses seems, at first sight, a sufficiently substantial penalty, but when the defendant is a dealer engaged in the oversea traffic and has been several times previously convicted for cruelty to animals, most people will think that he richly deserved imprisonment without the option of a fine. Not so the Reading magistrates, however, who contented themselves last week with promising one such offender prison on the next occasion. In this instance, as in many others, an ounce of performance would have been worth a pound of promises.

---

The Tredegar justices last week also exhibited equally misplaced indulgence towards a hawker who had beaten a horse about the head and body with a "Norway" prop and with a sledge-hammer. After this brutal punishment the animal was on the sick-list for sixteen days, yet the magistrates only fined the perpetrator £2 2s. and costs. Why will the Great Unpaid keep all their mercy for crimes of brutality?

Last week a lady living at Guildford was favoured with the following letter, signed "Baring and Co.," and dated from 4, Vale Place, Epsom Road, Guildford:—

> It has come to our knowledge that residents in this part are at times unable to obtain the overdraft they want at their bankers, and it appears to us that another source is required—viz., a substantial firm of a purely private character, where arrangements can be easily made for, say, £25 to £500 overdraft. We beg to inform you that we are prepared to meet the above demand.

I commend "Baring and Co." to the attention of the Chief Constable of Guildford with a view to a prosecution under the Money Lenders Act. The real name of the individual using this alias is Frank Percy Curtis. In July last he registered himself as a moneylender trading as Curtis and Curtis, at Newcastle Chambers, Nottingham. Recently he attempted to register himself afresh as "Baring and Co.," but new registrations in assumed names are not now accepted at Somerset House, and his application was accordingly refused. He then, on November 12, obtained registration as F. P. Curtis with the above-mentioned addresses at Guildford and Nottingham. By using the unregistered name of "Baring and Co." Curtis has rendered himself liable to a fine of £100, and his offence is aggravated by the fact that he so used it subsequently to his failure to get it registered. No doubt the lady from whom I have heard is not the only resident of Guildford who has been circularised by this tout, and it is obviously the duty of the police to proceed against him.

Two City companies have sent me specimens of money-lending circulars which have been addressed to their employees by Richards and Co., formerly of 39, Lombard Street, and now of 10 and 11, Lime Street, E.C. Richards and Co. is the alias of an unprincipled shark named William Henry Burgess, whose methods of preying upon city clerks I have frequently exposed. So long, of course, as he keeps within the letter of the law his pestilent game cannot be stopped, but he has now made the mistake of sending his circulars to more than one youth under age, and thereby committed an offence for which I hope he will be prosecuted and heavily fined. It may be of assistance in securing Burgess his deserts if any other firms whose junior employees have been circularised will communicate with me.

A public librarian has passed on to me a circular from a tipster calling himself Aubrey Milton (his real name is Cashmore), of Llangwm House, Croydon, which was directed to a person unknown at the library. It is suggested that a fictitious name was used in the expectation that the circular would fall into the hands of one of the library assistants and tempt him to spend some of his scanty wages in acquiring Milton's "special information." Very likely. This man was once convicted of circularising an undergraduate, and harpies of his class are capable of any dodge for attracting youthful greenhorns.

The residents of Petersfield and district will do well to be on their guard against a well-dressed female representing the Victoria Fine Art Company, of 7, Winchester Street, Bethnal Green, London, E. She obtained admission into a lady's drawing-room recently, and on the usual pretext of advertising the work of the firm secured possession of a much-prized and valuable photograph. The "free" enlargement was ultimately handed over on payment of 6s. 6d., but the original photograph, which was of much greater value, has not been returned. One can never trust these free-portrait tricksters further than one can see them.

It seems about time that the managers of the Times and the Morning Post should have discovered the true nature of the advertisements from Ashley Larkins which continue to appear in their columns. One of the latest guaranteed a good salary for literary assistance by an M.P. or a University man, applicants for the position receiving the usual invitation from "A. L. Hants" to demonstrate their fitness for the position by sending in a review of "England's Government of Her Dependencies," while they were further informed that a copy of the agreement for engagement could be obtained from 12, Army and Navy Mansions for a shilling. M.P.'s are not very likely to spend a shilling in an endeavour to tie themselves on to Larkins' tail, but evidently University men are being caught or the advertisements would not continue to appear.

---

Further light on the value of the statements made by the officials of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company is afforded by the following letter which I have received from the Premier of the Province of Saskatchewan. The reference is to an extract from a letter written by Mr. George Attwood, the engineer of the proposed railway, to Mr. Greville, the managing director of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company:—

Executive Council, Saskatchewan.

Regina, November 7, 1910.

SIR,—In issue of TRUTH of October 12, 1910, appears an article on "The Hudson's Bay and Pacific Mystery," containing an extract from a letter sent from Prince Albert, Canada. The letter contains the statement that the Canadian Government "will guarantee the bonds and assist us generally," and proceeds: "I have also met the Hon. Walter Scott, Premier of the Province of Saskatchewan, and he is with us also."

The assertion respecting myself may mean anything or nothing, but, to prevent possible misconception, I beg to state that the Government of Saskatchewan has not considered the question of granting aid to the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway project, nor did I, directly or indirectly, convey intimation to any person or persons that this Government is likely to grant such aid.—Believe me, yours truly,

WALTER SCOTT.

---

It is thus made clear that there is no more ground for statements that the Provincial Governments in Canada have undertaken to guarantee the bonds of the proposed railway than there was for the assertion that the Dominion Government had promised to do so. Meanwhile a letter from the Dominion Minister of Railways, Mr. George P. Graham, published in Canada on November 19, makes quite clear the present position of affairs. In this letter Mr. Graham states the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company route has been approved as regards part of the distance, but no bonds have been guaranteed and no promises made to guarantee them. He goes on to state that this "does not mean that no aid in the way of subsidy could be given," since the policy of the Government has been "to aid railways in opening up new portions of the country, and the application of any line which accomplishes this object is always given full consideration."

---

This is a very different thing from the promise of a guarantee which Mr. Greville assured me had been received by his company, and I should like to hear what he has to say to it. I should also be interested to learn whether the contract for the construction of the line which he informed my representative would be entered into within a week or two has yet been signed. A month has elapsed since Mr. Greville asserted that he would be able to furnish me with the details of this contract within a week or two, but I have had no communication from him.

The deaf are such a mark for the quack nowadays that I am always glad to welcome any assistance in preventing them being victimised. For this reason I would cordially recommend the perusal of "Surdus in Search of his Hearing," by Evan Yellon, to the deaf and also to the advertisement managers of those newspapers which aid and abet the aural quack in his depredations. It is not only with the exposure of quackery that Mr. Yellon concerns himself. He also deals in detail with those aids which from personal experience and investigation he has found of material benefit in mitigating the affliction. I am not hard of hearing myself, but if I were I can think of no one to whom I would more readily turn for advice than Mr. Yellon.

SAM AND JACK.

A.D. 1812.

Full oft they met in days of yore
And each the other tried to whack,
While raged an internecine war
Between the Cousins Sam and Jack.

Then either rival found his foe
The toughest of tough nuts to crack.
"When Greek met Greek," 'twas ever so;
And so it was with Sam and Jack.

No wonder. Sea-dogs both! For take
The record of their forbears back—
The blood of Frobisher and Drake
Is found no less in Sam than Jack.

So both, who thence their lineage drew,
For stubborn valour could not lack.
So wigs were fairly on the—blue,
When Sam conclusions tried with Jack.

A.D. 1910.

To-day we view a different scene;
No more each other's heads they crack;
Goodwill and friendship rule between These sailor cousins, Sam and Jack.

The men to Frobisher and Drake
Their ancestry alike who track,
As kinsmen should, their feuds forsake;
And Sam is hand-in-glove with Jack.

'Tis well... The common stock of those Who singed the Spaniard's whiskers black
Should, rightly, meet as friends, not foes;
Sam should stand ranged in line with Jack.

Methinks—or so my fancy runs—
The voice of Drake comes echoing back
From Tudor days, "Your hands, my sons,
Go on and prosper, Sam and Jack!

"While thus you stand together lined
Where is the foe who dare attack?
For not the whole World's fleets combined
Would care to tackle Sam and Jack."

SCRUTATOR.

THE LAST DITCH.

WE have reverted, as Mr. Asquith says, to a state of war, and mobilisation is the order of the day. On both sides it is assumed that the coming election will be of a momentous and epoch-making character. Possibly it may prove so, but up to now the general opinion on both sides has been that no very substantial change is likely to occur in the state of parties, in which case the election will decide nothing. The cardinal fact in the present situation is that the Irish Party holds the balance of power at Westminster, and to alter that fact the pendulum must swing very decidedly in one direction or the other. It is because no such swing appears probable that the policy of an immediate dissolution is open to question. If the Government comes back short of the number of seats required to give it a free hand in the ordering of its own policy without regard to Mr. Redmond, it will be no better off than it is at present, for it can only lead the sort of life which is the inevitable prelude to a big disaster. If it finds its composite majority materially reduced and takes refuge in resignation, a weak Liberal Government is succeeded by a weak Conservative one, with a further period of political paralysis to follow, and yet another general election in prospect. These reflections will not commend themselves to the majority of Liberal stalwarts, who have made up their minds that they are going to win a great electoral victory. If that happens, the dissolution will be justified by the result. But in the meantime one can only look at probabilities.

It must be confessed that the Government and their supporters have some ground for going out to battle in high spirits. Whatever may be passing in the minds of the electors, the Unionist leaders do not quite shape like the generals of an invincible host. Their spasmodic and paralytic manœuvres remind one rather of the condition of Louis Napoleon and his men of war on the eve of Sedan. A desperate effort has been made during the past week to produce a great electioneering picture of the House of Lords as a body of modest and inoffensive gentlemen, profoundly conscious of their own shortcomings, sincerely desirous of reforming themselves on up-to-date lines, and only baulked of their desire by the rude and violent behaviour of the Government, which insists on cramming a Veto Bill down their throats, and appealing to the country for help if they hesitate to bolt it at one gulp. This is a very pretty picture, but it can only convince those who require no convincing. The engaging portrait now presented to the country is hardly that of the assembly which has been engaged during the last five years in riding roughshod over the decisions of the House of Commons, and which only twelve months ago rejected a Budget without a precedent to justify it in all the centuries of its history. Any man who has a mind to make up on the question of the moment must ask himself why their Lordships did not reflect upon the defective constitution of their own House and the anachronism of their own legislative powers during all the five years that they were flouting the elected representatives of the nation, instead of suddenly bethinking themselves that they require reforming at the moment when the nation is being called to pronounce judgment upon them.

The strength of the Government position as against these manœuvres lies to a great extent in the fact that a settlement of the question by negotiation has been tried and has failed. Lord Selborne said last week what has been several times said in TRUTH, namely, that no settlement of a constitutional issue of this gravity can be accepted as final if it is forced by one side on the other. But this perfectly reasonable proposition applies equally to both sides. It is the Liberal Party which can never accept a settlement as final which does not concede the main point for which the party is now contending, namely, that a Liberal House of Commons shall no longer be exposed to obstruction, humiliation, and defeat at the will of a Conservative House of Lords. That this contention is reasonable has been frankly conceded by many representatives of the other side since the difficulty between the two Houses became acute. But is what is now offered to the Liberal Party an honest attempt to remove their just grievance? The Rosebery resolution which was adopted last week does not even touch the Liberal case. There is nothing in it that promises any modification of the character of the House of Lords as a permanent and irresponsible Conservative caucus. The noble author tells us that the time has not arrived for discussing the details of his scheme, and that he merely lays down principles. But in this matter the details are everything and the principles little or nothing, while, so far as details are vouchsafed to us, they suggest that the Rosebery House offered to us in the future would differ only from the Lansdowne House which we know too well at present in being a stronger instrument for effecting the purpose of checkmating the House of Commons. No Liberal can possibly agree to this. As regards the resolutions which Lord Lansdowne is now producing for the purpose of adjusting the relations between the two Houses, while they concede in principle something of what is asked for in the Government Veto Bill, it is beyond their purpose to meet the demand for a Second Chamber in which the measures submitted by a Liberal House of Commons will have a chance of being considered and dealt with upon their merits. At the point at which the controversy has now reached no concession on the mere question of procedure in cases of deadlock can possibly be accepted by Liberals as satisfactory. The Rosebery and Lansdowne resolutions are of considerable interest, because they presumably embody the irreducible minimum which was offered to their opponents by the Opposition members in the late Conference. On that view of them there is no difficulty in seeing why the Conference broke down, nor in seeing the necessity thus created for an appeal to Cæsar at the polls. Both parties are, of course, entitled to put their case before the court; but what must be understood by Cæsar if he is to do justice between them is that the principal question now at issue is whether the House of Lords is to decide what are to be its future consitution and its future powers.

While the Unionists are obviously entitled to get their own reforms "on the record," the tactical value of this proceeding is extremely doubtful. When it is admitted, as it is, that the present constitution of the Upper House and its present unrestricted power of veto are indefensible, what have the Opposition got left to fight for? What sort of a case for the House of Lords is the unfortunate Unionist candidate now expected to preseat to his electors? The only visible issue left to be voted upon is whether the business of reform shall be undertaken by the Liberals without reference to the wishes of the Lords, or by the Unionists, who will certainly promise no Reform Bill which the Lords themselves are not willing to pass. To put it in a nutshell, the question for the decision of the country is whether the House is to be reformed from within or from without. In the minds of the majority of electors there cannot be much doubt about the answer when the question is presented in that shape and unobscured by side issues; and consequently it is not surprising that desperate efforts are being made to put the Opposition case on any ground but this. As a matter of tactics, the Unionist generals have abandoned the only ground there was to defend, and apparently they have no plan of campaign except to carry on a sort of guerrilla warfare, in which each unit of the party will operate "on its own," employing whatever tactics or weapons are suggested by local circumstances. Their only hope is in the mercy of Providence—to be manifested in an automatic swing of "the pendulum." Acting under such guidance and inspiration as are vouchsafed to them, the rank and file are now doing what they can to lead the electors off the scent by means of Mr. Redmond and his "American dollars"—Mr. Redmond, who is hailed as a patriotic statesman by Mr. Garvin in the Fortnightly Review and denounced as the paid agent of alien foes by the same Mr. Garvin in the Observer. The "American dollars" will doubtless be followed in due course by the state of the Navy, the progress of Socialism, or any other putrid red herring which promises to serve its purpose. This is the best that can now be done for the defence of one of the most venerable of our cherished political institutions. Those who have so long laboured and waited for the disestablishment of the hereditary legislator may well feel happy in their minds as they survey the situation, for it is evident that the Lords are lining their last ditch, and that the only question left is how soon they will evacuate it.

CARPENTER'S CREDITORS.

The "Truth" Charges Justified.

Much of the speech of Mr. E. Leadam Hough, the Senior Official Receiver, at the meeting of the creditors of Alfred William Carpenter, trading as the Charing Cross Bank, was like an echo of the articles which appeared in Truth during 1907. Here are a couple of sentences from my article of November 7 in that year:—

> The whole pretence that this bank is a bank within the ordinary meaning of the word is in itself a fraud upon innocent investors. It is by means of that pretence that they are induced to lend their money, not knowing that they are placing it at the absolute disposal of the man who may—and does—use it for the purpose of any rash and hazardous speculation in which he is inclined to engage.

Mr. Hough's first words to the creditors were that this never was a bank. He explained (as I did in 1907) that it was originally a money-lending concern, but that in recent years Carpenter made use of it mainly to obtain deposits of money from the public for the purpose of the "very rash and hazardous schemes" in which he was engaged. I showed that at the time I wrote his expenditure on press advertising and branch offices was going up by leaps and bounds, and I gave what I regarded as good reasons for believing that the object of all this expenditure was to get in new deposits "to discharge accruing liabilities." This is now practically endorsed by the Official Receiver. In the last three years Carpenter has spent £40,000 in advertising—the newspapers have, as usual in these cases, taken a good share of the plunder—and in the last five years the opening of branches in all parts of the country—branches only established, as Mr. Hough says, to secure deposits—has cost something like £35,000. I estimated that "the average rate of interest paid by Carpenter must be at least 7½ per cent." It now appears that it was as much as 8¼ per cent. Many unfortunate dupes fondly imagined that everything must be all right because the interest was being paid regularly; but, as I pointed out, there was no difficulty in paying interest regularly so long as new depositors were constantly pouring cash into the coffers of the bank. What I argued, and what is now officially confirmed, was that the interest was not being earned, but was being paid out of capital. It was an instance of the process vulgarly known as "feeding the dog on its own tail." Mr. Hough states that the actual earnings of this bank, which was paying 8¼ per cent. on a capital of between two and three millions sterling, were not more than sufficient to pay the office expenses! "There can be but one end to such a business, and the longer it is postponed the more disastrous it will be." That is what I said in the last of the series of articles, whereon Carpenter commenced the action for libel against TRUTH, which, owing to causes already explained, has never been tried. From the first I have been prepared to justify my criticism of this business, and in the light of what has now happened I think it will be generally agreed that in the public interest it is a misfortune that Carpenter was able legally to secure the suspension of those criticisms (though, by the way, the City Editor of TRUTH has never ceased to warn inquirers against the bank) by issuing a writ. The result is that the loss and suffering occasioned by this man's failure are infinitely greater than they would have been if I had been permitted to complete the destruction of the bank three years ago. Thousands of new depositors have been roped in, and the liabilities have probably been increased to the extent of over a million pounds. According to Mr. Hough, deposits were latterly coming in at the rate of about £10,000 a week.

It is highly interesting to learn that the collapse of this gigantic ramp was brought about by the active intervention of the Public Prosecutor, acting with the approval of the Attorney-General. It became known to the Public Prosecutor that in August last a firm of chartered accountants who examined Carpenter's books —under what circumstances is not disclosed—had impressed upon him the fact that he was insolvent; and thereupon the Public Prosecutor informed Carpenter that unless he discontinued the acceptance of deposits and called his creditors together drastic action might be taken. No doubt the Public Prosecutor adopted what he deemed to be the most prudent course, but I confess that I fail to understand why the "drastic action" was not taken there and then instead of being threatened. It was on August 19 that Carpenter was warned by the accountants, but he nevertheless went on receiving deposits until October 17, and it seems to me that the people who parted with tens of thousands of pounds during that period have good grounds for complaining of the manner in which the matter has been handled. It is now the duty of the Senior Official Receiver to investigate the debtor's conduct, and, if he feels warranted in doing so, to make a report to the responsible authorities, with a view to his prosecution and punishment. Mr. Hough may be relied upon to make a thorough investigation, and there can be little doubt that he will find reason to recommend a prosecution. Certainly it will be a scandal if the law is found to be incapable of bringing Carpenter to book in a criminal court.

The figures given by Mr. Hough on Monday show that the failure is even more disastrous than was originally supposed. On the one hand it is now found that the liabilities will exceed the first estimate of £2,500,000 by another £300,000 or perhaps £500,000. On the other hand, the assets are likely to realise much less than was estimated by the debtor. It is true that an optimistic report has been received from the manager of the mining property in the Transvaal in which the debtor has sunk £60,000 of other people's money—the money which they supposed was employed in a banking business—but the fact remains that after eight years' work on this property it has not got beyond the prospecting stage, and to count upon any considerable return from that source would be foolish. As to the Atlantic Quebec, and Western Railway, Carpenter informed the Official Receiver that his expenditure thereon was £1,250,000 or more. It is a characteristic example of his methods that no verification of this statement has been found, the aggregate amount of the payments the Official Receiver has been able to trace being about £800,000. Whether this railway will ever be a financial success is a point upon which opinions differ, but there can be no two opinions regarding Carpenter's conduct in employing the funds of his bank in such an essentially speculative undertaking. Mr. Hough expressed the opinion that at the best a large portion of the money sunk in this undertaking must be regarded as irrecoverable; but precisely how much of the £800,000 will eventually be got back for the creditors will, of course, depend to a great extent upon the skill with which the difficult business of realising the estate is carried out by the trustees appointed at the meeting on Monday. Taking the most rosy view of the position, it seems unlikely that the deficiency can be much less than £2,000,000. I predicted in 1907 that "the end of this concern will be a financial crash of considerable magnitude"; but it has turned out an even bigger calamity than I feared.

THE KENNEL CLUB AGAIN.

Not content with the odium they have already incurred by their treatment of Mrs. Ashton Cross, the Kennel Club Committee have taken a further opportunity of manifesting their spite against this lady. In earlier references in TRUTH to Mrs. Cross's case it was rather assumed that the Committee was merely afflicted with a muddle-headed inability to understand the value of evidence; but the only conclusion to be drawn from their latest proceeding is that their perversity of judgment is the outcome of personal animosity. However, let the facts speak for themselves.

On December 10, 1909, a pet dog show was held at the Royal Horticultural Hall. Amongst the exhibitors was Mrs. Ashton Cross, who benched about twenty dogs in all, some of them for competition—three of them in the selling class only. Amongst the latter was a parti-coloured Pekingese, described in the catalogue as Kangia of Alderbourne, born September 19, 1908, by Hewbury Kwang Tai, ex Chenda of Alderbourne, and priced at twenty guineas. Amongst the visitors to the show were Dr. Forbes Winslow and Mrs. Winslow. The dog attracted Mrs. Winslow's attention, and she and the doctor inquired its price and bought it for five guineas. The dog was delivered, and nothing more happened until February, when Dr. Winslow, being desirous of entering his purchase at the St. Albans Show, asked Mrs. Cross for the pedigree. In reply he received a pedigree showing that the dog's sire was Wang-Chia Ting of Alderbourne, and the dam Kia of Alderbourne. An explanation was given to Dr. Winslow that by mistake of a kennel girl another dog had been sent to the show, and that the pedigree now sent was accurate. Thereupon the matter was dropped for a time, and there seems no reason why it should ever have been revived. The mere mistake involved no sort of injury to anybody. Dr. Forbes Winslow had the dog he selected, and so far as the pedigrees were concerned there was nothing to choose between those of the two dogs. However, on October 25 last, six months after the explanation had been furnished, Dr. Forbes Winslow lodged a complaint with the Kennel Club against Mrs. Cross in respect of the transaction. The Kennel Club Committee followed their usual course by citing Mrs. Cross to appear before them. Moved by her previous experience of Kennel Club justice, and by the advice of eminent counsel who represented her on the previous occasion, Mrs. Cross decided not to appear at the hearing of the complaint, and she merely sent statutory declarations by herself and her kennel-maid setting out their version of the case. The Committee thereupon adjudicated in Mrs. Cross's absence, found her guilty of discreditable conduct, and ordered her suspension for a further twelve months, to take effect upon the completion of the term imposed on the last occasion.

The iniquity of the finding is even more conspicuous on this occasion than the last. The only fact proved against Mrs. Cross is that she sent by mistake the wrong dog to a show, not as a competitor, but merely for sale. It has not been and cannot be suggested that the purchaser was prejudiced in any way by the error. Yet for this piece of carelessness Mrs. Cross is again treated by the Kennel Club Committee as if she were guilty of some infamous piece of sharp practice. The case is on all fours with the previous one in that respect. It proves merely that Mrs. Cross was somewhat casual in her business methods. But unbusinesslike habits do not constitute discreditable conduct, and even supposing that it had been necessary to call Mrs. Cross to account for them it is outrageous that such a penalty should have been imposed. Not for an instant can the new charge be considered an aggravation of the previous one. Comparison of the dates shows that it is not until long after the "offence" has been committed that Dr. Forbes Winslow makes his complaint. Dr. Winslow purchased the dog in December, 1909. He discovered the mistake about the pedigree in February, 1910, but took no steps until October. Meanwhile the proceedings against Mrs. Cross in connection with the previous case had been in progress, the finding being made known in June. Even then Dr. Winslow took no action. It is not until after public indignation had been aroused by the Kennel Club Committee's decision in that case, not until resignations by influential members of the Kennel Club have taken place, that Dr. Winslow rakes up his charge of discreditable conduct against a lady for a mere piece of carelessness by which he has suffered no injury whatever. I cannot compliment him on either his good taste or his good feeling. Indeed, it would be only charitable to suppose that he has allowed himself to be made the tool of the Kennel Club Committee in a spiteful endeavour to discredit Mrs. Cross, a supposition borne out by the penalty imposed by the Committee on the strength of his trumpery complaint.

THE "DOSSIER" OF A FINANCIER.

A recent application to TRUTH for information revealed once again the risks which beset business men in search of additional capital, and at the same time disclosed a novel venture on the part of an enterprising individual who has come under my notice in various characters a good many times in the last few years. The time seems to have arrived when it will be a benefit to the public to piece together the information in my possession respecting this individual, and it will be convenient to start with the negotiation in which he was concerned at the particular moment when my attention was directed to him.

Some little time ago the accountants of a limited company in the North of England received an offer from a concern called the Cosmopolitan Finance Syndicate, of 4, Leicester Street, London, W.C., to undertake the raising of additional capital for the company if it was wanted. The offer was passed on to the directors, who, considering the time a favourable one for an extension of the company's business, placed themselves in communication with the Syndicate. In the negotiations that followed, the Syndicate represented that they were connected with Continental bankers, who were prepared to advance to sound concerns sums ranging from £15,000 to £100,000, and to market the shares amongst their customers, and ultimately they submitted a scheme for the placing of 25,000 shares of £1 each. The scheme was embodied in a draft agreement, which provided for the payment of £150 to the Syndicate on the signing of the agreement; for the transfer to the Syndicate of an unnamed number of shares; for the appointment of a nominee of the Syndicate on the board of directors of the company; and for the appointment of Messrs. Barrett and Co., of 4, Leicester Street, as solicitors to the company. There was also a penalty clause, whereby the company undertook to pay a further sum of £250 if it should fail to carry out the arrangements or to proceed further with the matter. At this stage of the negotiations inquiries were made at TRUTH Office about the Cosmopolitan Finance Syndicate, and the information which I was able to furnish to the directors of the company respecting the career of the leading spirit of the Cosmopolitan Finance Syndicate was of a character calculated to deter them from proceeding any further with the business. It is not likely, however, that this company is the only firm to whom similar propositions have been made from the same quarter; and it may save disappointment and possibly loss of money if I make public what I know respecting the only member of the Syndicate whom I have been able to identify.

The individual in question is a man named John Beauchamp Noel. He is a native of Jersey, and his early life seems to have been somewhat adventurous, including a bankruptcy at St. Heliers among other episodes. There is no occasion, however, to recall here this stage of his career. After his bankruptcy he came to England and devoted his talents to insurance business, serving successively as agent for the General Accident Insurance Company and the Rock Life Insurance Company. Having lost both these positions, he started in business on his own account in Birmingham, trading under various names, and finally he came to London and embarked on an extraordinary series of insurance enterprises. The character of these any man of business can see for himself. In 1903, in conjunction with a man named Tompkins, Noel started the Tower Insurance Company, which was run from a couple of rooms in Featherstone Buildings, Holborn. The "Tower" fell down, but was promptly succeeded by the Citizen General Insurance Company at the same address. At the same time Noel had other irons in the fire, including a concern called the Times Insurance Company, at 7, King William Street. He next launched a business which incurred a good deal of notice in TRUTH—the beginning of my acquaintance with his operations. Apparently he acquired in some way the registration certificate of a moribund company, with a nominal capital of £100,000, called the Castle Insurance Company. He took offices at 35, Surrey Street, Strand, and made a show of setting the company to work. A number of persons were induced to take shares, and Noel also appointed local agents, inspectors, branch secretaries, and so forth on condition that they invested in the company's shares. A good many insurance premiums were also raked in. The inevitable result followed. A fire insurance claim had to be met. The "Castle" was unable to meet the claim, and bankruptcy proceedings followed in 1905. These showed a deficiency of £10,985, and the Official Receiver in his report gave his opinion that fraud had been committed by Noel, and advised that proceedings should be taken against him, but, as usual, nothing resulted from this. At this time Noel had transferred the business to 28, Basinghall Street; he was himself living at 28, Stanley Road, Oxford. In the same year an action was brought against him arising out of negotiations for the amalgamation of a live-stock insurance company with the Castle. The plaintiff obtained judgment for £260, but the money was never paid.

After the collapse of the Castle Insurance Company Noel took offices at 45, Finsbury Square, and started a company called the Credit Foncier, Limited, and another called the Commercial Service Company, Limited, and in 1906 he appeared at 52, Regent Street and 41, Charing Cross Road, carrying on business under the name of Travel, Limited. One of the objects of this company seems to have been to obtain advertisements for a publication called the Continental A.B.C. He next made an excursion to Paris, where he seems to have been connected with a journal called Le Ciel and a French postcard business, but this is the only French enterprise on his part that I have heard of prior to the reference to "Continental bankers" in connection with the Cosmopolitan Finance Syndicate mentioned at the beginning of this article. In 1907 I heard of him again in connection with a notorious American quack medicine swindle called the Nutriola Company, started in the United States by a man named Hanson, and puffed all over the world by a huge advertising campaign. The British branch of this business seems to have come into Noel's hands when it was rather on the down grade, and owing to this Noel came into the TRUTH Cautionary List in 1908. About the same period he also had offices at 144, Gray's Inn Road, in the name of Murray Lang and Co., and collected money for advertisements in unknown papers. In 1908 I came across him again at 4, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, in the character of the Universal Providers' Association, a fee-snatching agency ostensibly existing for providing paying guests, and also a detective agency, which was another dodge for obtaining money from prospective employees. That was the last I heard of him until I discovered that he was one of the principals in the Cosmopolitan Finance Syndicate, referred to at the outset of this article.

Not the least remarkable feature in this remarkable record is that in all these years Noel has escaped getting into serious trouble. This alone would be sufficient to stamp him as a somewhat clever person. On the other hand, from beginning to end of the story there is no evidence of his having been engaged in anything that could be described as a respectable and genuine business. That is, I think, a sufficient reason for advising business men to exercise caution when approached by his present syndicate with schemes for providing them with capital. It appears that he is rather fond of bringing libel actions against newspapers. In 1904 he started an action against the Cardiff Western Mail, in 1905 against the Financial Times and the Financier, and in 1906 against John Bull, which accused him of fraud and of being the associate of gaol-birds. In no case, however, were the actions proceeded with. I hope he will not trouble me with any of his writs, but if he does he may rest assured that it will be the worse for him.

THE WEEK AT WESTMINSTER.

WE are here to-day and gone to-morrow, in the most literal sense. Some of us, shrewdly anticipating the nature of the Prime Minister's statement on Friday afternoon, came down to the House with bags packed and travelling coats ready, and were off to the constituencies without so much as waiting for lunch. It is a state of war again, and we Parliament men are mobilising. No considerable number of us want to remain to discuss the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill and the tea duty, although, of course, "the Master" has to see to it that his forces are not dangerously depleted, and that a Government defeat is not imposed upon the many other complications of the situation. How one envies the University members, with the "soft thing" of their secure and comfortable seats! But it's no use wishing to be Sir Henry Craik or Lord Hugh Cecil; besides, the Universities have a trick of returning Tories; so I shall see the week through, and do my best to help "the Master," who shall find me as faithful as the Seraph Abdiel—"unshaken, unseduced, unterrified, his loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal," oh! most benign of Patronage Secretaries, if ever you should come to think of it—and then devote myself to explaining to my perplexed supporters what it is all about.

When we crowded into the House on Tuesday it was something of a shock to find that our leader was absent. The formal proceedings resolved themselves into an arrangement as to whether we should adjourn till Thursday or Friday, but some of us stayed on to hear the Tonypandy debate, in the course of which Mr. William Abraham, of Rhondda, delivered a short but extremely impressive speech ringing with Celtic fervour. Mr. Abraham thinks out his phrases in Welsh and then presents them in the best English at his command, and very good Bunyan prose it is, but I wish that I understood Welsh and that he might be permitted to deliver himself in his native tongue, for I am convinced that the original far transcends anything he is able to give us on the floor of the House. Very stockily built, almost as broad as he is long, with a massive head covered with thick, iron-grey hair, "Mabon" is an arresting personality, and, despite his frequent plea that he has no command of language, a speaker who enjoys respect. On Tuesday he won our sympathy as well, for he stood there lamenting, like a Hebrew prophet, the falling-away of his generation. He could not believe that the miners, for whom he has worked and organised and whom he has represented for a quarter of a century, had been guilty of the blood-thirstiness and destructiveness of Tonypandy, and appealed for a public inquiry to clear their characters. Compared with the superficiality and trickery of an ordinary debate the honest emotion and mother eloquence of this Welshman stood out as something pleasantly memorable.

The venue of interest changed swiftly from one House to the other, where "reform" went ahead at break-neck speed. Lord Rosebery was the god in the car, and didn't he rattle it over the grass-grown thorough-fares of that venerable institution! Quite a number of our men watched the performance, and among them, one afternoon, was Mr. Dillon, whom the Old Hand does not remember having seen in the gilded chamber before. So alluring was the state of affairs that even Mr. Dillon's life-long dislike of the Peers and their doings succumbed to a little natural curiosity, though he would not make himself at home in the place to the extent of taking off his great-coat. Just a flying visit; a peep—perhaps a final one—at the hereditary enemy; that was all the concession that he would make to the frailty of inquisitiveness; and some of us thought that his sombre presence in our gallery gave an appropriate touch of the undertaker to the scene.

Lord Rosebery seems to typify the mental attitude of the Peers at the present moment. Normally aloof from the reality of events, absorbed by doubt and misgiving, the prey of horrid imaginings, he has sat on the cross benches since his semi-retirement wrapped in a gloom of negativeness. And the majority of the Peers, for all their spruceness and perfect manners, have behaved like so many Gorgons to all progressive measures. With them and their House it has been a case of "'Thou shalt not' writ over the door." Suddenly all this has changed. Lord Rosebery changed, and with him changed the Unionist leaders and their rank and file. From a listless, apathetic observer on the cross-benches he became an active, crafty politician, seizing his opportunities and developing his policy with rare skill. Perhaps it would have seemed franker if Lord Crewe had stated plainly at the outset that while the Government had no objection to the Lords considering the Parliament Bill, to take it or leave it as they pleased, there was to be no reopening of the Conference coram populo by the adoption of vital amendments. He did drop some hint of the kind, but it was not exactly understood, and Lord Rosebery had to subject him to a rapid fire of cross-examination before the point was roundly declared. When they thoroughly grasped it the Tory Peers exclaimed "Ah!" in a most human and unorthodox fashion. From that instant Lord Rosebery threw off his lethargy and became a man of action, and the Opposition front bench almost tumbled over each other in their eagerness to promote reform. What was material for slow assimilation and mature consideration in March was approved, endorsed, and ratified in the course of three hours, and every Tory speaker was elbowing his neighbour for an opportunity to avow himself a passionate reformer. Without even troubling to adjourn the debate over dinner, they tore up the ancient Constitution by the roots and substituted a brand-new, if somewhat mythical, Second Chamber which the Mother of Parliaments will have some difficulty in recognising. The Peers had been exhorted by their friends to "make history," and I must say they did it with promptitude and despatch. It was a positive mercy that the debate ended when it did. A little more of it, and we might have had Lord Halsbury pitching his hat into the ring and abolishing things right and left.

When Mr. Asquith came, at length, to announce the Dissolution on Friday, the crowded House was so seized of the facts that the dramatic element was virtually absent. As I have said, many of the members set out forthwith on the campaign. Quite the best features of the afternoon were the side-speeches—Mr. William O'Brien gently chaffing Mr. Redmond, whose studied silence is a masterpiece of tactics; Mr. Timothy Healy essaying to lay the Home Rule bogey by offering the Ulstermen all the guarantees they want; and Mr. Belloc wittily denouncing the Dissolution as a last attempt, foredoomed, in his opinion, to failure, to save the party system. The two front benches looked uncommonly uncomfortable when Mr. Belloc depicted the party system as a sort of family arrangement for sharing the plunder of office.

The Lords again took up the running on Wednesday evening, for I doubt whether the dialectical points raised by Mr. Austen Chamberlain and answered by the Chancellor in the Commons as to the precise amount of time allotted to the discussion of the Veto resolutions will be understanded of the people. My experience of Parliament is that we spend an enormous amount of time and energy in bickering over little domestic wrangles which seem all important to us, who are immersed in the everyday concern of politics, but for which the ordinary man outside does not care a fig. Keener interest and louder cheers will follow one of these petty internal disagreements than many a broad national issue will excite, and yet the Old Hand says that it has always been so, and that each successive House, however new and ardent, soon gets into the parish-pump mood. Well, Lord Lansdowne struck out another new and resourceful line by meeting the motion for the second reading of the Parliament Bill with a motion for the adjournment of the debate until to-day, and offering his alternative policy in the form of a series of resolutions to settle differences between the two Houses that may arise on any measure, including Money Bills. It was very ingenious and superficially attractive, but some of us would like to put it to the test of critical examination. The sands, however, have run out.

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

V.—THE TRUST AND THE TRADE.

IT was remarked in a previous article that the unfair advantages conceded to Mr. Rockefeller by the conspiring railroads afford a sufficient answer to the Standard Oil Trust's contention that the secret of its success lies in its superior business ability. But there is no need to deny a high level of business ability to Mr. Rockefeller and his associates. The Standard Oil leaders have in general been men gifted with a keen insight into human nature and with the unshaken self-confidence that usually sways others. The human crowd is mostly made up of irresolute fools, jostling each other about at the dictation of petty prejudice or momentary whim, while dotted about in it here and there are a few people who know their own minds, and sooner or later get what they want. The Standard Oil people have always enjoyed this legitimate advantage of knowing exactly what they intend doing. Otherwise they could never have prevailed so long over the American public, which has never suspended its hostility towards them from the time it demanded the repeal of the South Improvement Company's charter down to the week before last, when it turned the Republican party out of power, largely for its failure to do justice against the Trusts. Granting, however, that the Standard people are the keenest of business men, it is equally certain that they have pushed their keenness to the point where it has become mere unscrupulous cunning and chicanery. This is conspicuously shown in the history of the Trust in its character of salesmen.

The System of Espionage.

Every local agent for the sale of Standard oil is required to furnish reports to the statistical department of the Standard Oil Trust at 26, Broadway, New York, of all the transactions entered into by every dealer in his district. His business, in short, is to know everybody else's business and to report it. This is done by filling up printed forms showing in parallel columns against every retailer's name in the district, be he shopkeeper or peddler, the description and brand of goods he buys and sells, how the goods have been transported, their price, and the name and address of the wholesale dealer who supplied them. The agent is stimulated in every way by reproof and reward to obtain the most intimate and apparently trifling details bearing upon the above points, and, as is well known in the United States, is generally converted by the system into a mere spy, who will not stick at bribery or any other dirty trick so long as he can give his chiefs the desired information. The Government found that the Standard's "statistical department" was presided over by a man named Christian Dredger—a name which, allied to the occupation, certainly reminds one of "the man with the muck-rake." The knowledge that a local grocer or peddler is buying elsewhere than from the Standard is no sooner received by mail or telegraph at the statistical department than a Standard agent is told off to swoop down upon the "irregular trader," and either by threats of underselling and ruining his business in case he persists to offer the "independent" oil, or by promising him a secret rebate on published prices, secures his adhesion to the standard of "the holy blue barrel"—to use the irreverent phrase in vogue in the States, the Standard's barrels being generally painted in that hue. If the agent can persuade the retailer to countermand his order from the independent, so much the better.

A Short Way with Competitors.

These accusations are proved beyond question by extant collections of hundreds of letters and numerous telegrams received by "independent" retailers, and by a superabundance of sworn testimony from all parts of the States. Just to show how the thing works, here is a typical letter received by a retailer who has been caught ordering oil from an independent, and has been "persuaded" to countermand the order:—

Des Moines, Iowa,
January 14, 1891.

John Fowler, Hampton, Iowa.

Dear Sir,—Our Marshallstown manager, Mr. Ruth, has explained the circumstances regarding the purchase and subsequent countermand of a car of oil from our competitors. He desires to have us express to you our promise that we will stand all expense, provided there should be any trouble growing out of the countermand of this car. We cheerfully promise to do this; we have the best legal advice which can be obtained in Iowa bearing on the points in this case. An order can be countermanded either before or after the goods have been shipped, and, in fact, can be countermanded even if the goods have already arrived and are at the depôt [anglice, railway station]. A firm is absolutely obliged to accept a countermand. The fact that the order has been signed does not make any difference. We want you to absolutely refuse under any circumstances to accept the car of oil. We are standing back of you in this matter, and will protect you in every way, and would kindly ask you to keep this letter strictly confidential.—Yours truly,

E. P. Pratt.

Another typical example of Standard methods is revealed in the following letter addressed to the Independent Oil Company, of Mansfield, Ohio, by one of its customers:—

Tiffin, Ohio, January 24, 1898.

Dear Sirs,—I am sorry to say that a Standard Oil man from your city followed that oil car and oil to my place, and told me that he would not let me make a dollar on that oil, and was dogging me around for two days to buy that oil, and made all kinds of threats, and talked to my people of the house while I was out, and persuaded me to sell, and I was in a stew what I should do, but I yielded, and I have been very sorry for it since. I thought I would hate to see the bottom knocked out of the prices, but that is why I did it—the only reason. The oil was all right. I now see the mistake, and that is of getting a carload. Two carloads coming in here inside of a week is more than the other company will stand. . . . Yours truly,

H. A. Eirick.

Chess, Carley and Co., the Standard marketing agents at Louisville, Kentucky, are big offenders in this respect. George Rice, of Marietta, Ohio, a well-known independent, offered a grocer named Armstrong, in Clarksville, Tennessee, a lower price for his oil than Chess, Carley and Co. would sell to him at. Armstrong mentioned the offer to the latter, and "was scared almost out of his boots," wrote Rice's agent.

"Carley told him," continues the agent, "he would break him up if he bought oil of any one else; that the Standard Company had authorised him to spend $10,000 to break up any concern that bought oil from any one else; that he (Carley) would put all his drummers in the field to hunt up Armstrong's customers, and sell his customers groceries at 5 per cent. below Armstrong's prices, and turn all Armstrong's trade over to Moore, Bremaker and Co., and settle with Moore, Bremaker and Co. for their losses in helping to break Armstrong up, every thirty days."

The Waters-Pierce Oil Company, the Standard's Texas and Mexico branch, are equally bad, and their methods are denounced by their customers in similar language to that already quoted. The retailers speak of their threats, their "cutting to kill;" they complain that the Standard agents "nose" about their premises, ask impudent questions, and generally make the trade disgusting and humiliating.

Bribery of Employees.

The system naturally results in bribing employees, not only of the railroads, but of the independents themselves, in order to gain information. The bribes seem to have been generally small in amount, but to have yielded wonderful results. For instance, in 1893, a negro boy who was induced by the Atlantic Refining Company, of Philadelphia (Standard Oil Subsidiary), to supply regular details of the business of the Lewis Emery Oil Company, his employers, was only paid $90 (£18) for supplying information as to the firm's daily shipments for about six months and also for smuggling his company's price-book to the Standard managers to be copied out! Most of the old legends about a man "selling his soul to the devil" make Mephistopheles do something very substantial as his part of the bargain. But the Standard Oil Trust is capable of giving his Satanic Majesty many wrinkles in "labour-saving" methods, and breaks down the moral sense of the rising generation on much more economic principles. E. M. Wilhoit, Standard agent at Topeka, Kansas, from 1891 to 1898, testified in the Missouri trial that his agency was allowed $8 (£1 12s. 6d.) a month for paying railroad employees for information of competitive shipments, Mr. E. P. Pratt, the manager of the Kansas City branch of the Consolidated Tank Line Company, forwarding this $8 from Kansas City by his personal cheque. Mr. G. W. Mayer, who succeeded Pratt, reduced this amount to $6 (25s.) a month. The cheques came in blank envelopes without any letter, and the instructions as to what should be done with the money were given verbally. The clerks of five different railways were called upon once a week for this information, which was generally written on a small slip of paper and handed to the drayman who took oil to the railroad. I select this case almost at random as a typical one from an ocean of similar evidence. From the tempter's point of view it certainly seems a very cheap line of damnation.

The Standard Stalking-Horses.

The constant policy of the Standard throughout its whole career has been superabundantly proved to be to cut prices where there is competition, and where there is none to raise them to the utmost point that customers will go to. The Standard has found that this practice has always caused a deal of talk whenever it has been recognised, and the Standard hates talk. It has made a good try to keep the talk down by spreading the idea about that it is the Standard's competitors who always begin the price-cutting, and, on finding it difficult to get this idea to go down with the public, it one fine day hit upon the expedient of putting "bogus independent" companies and peddlers in the field as stalking-horses to bear the odium of the price-cutting. I gave details in my first article of the origin and manipulation of two of these "independent" concerns, the Manhattan Oil Company of Ohio and the Security Oil Company of Texas. Occasionally, especially in the case of the peddlers, who do a big business in America, it has involved a deal of stagey "business" of all sorts to keep this deception up, a fact that makes the perusal of the evidence on this matter very entertaining and at times even amusing reading. But a very serious purpose and a very serious effect ran through the whole proceedings for years, which was, in general, to throw dust in the eyes of the public as to the game consistently played by the Standard, namely, to kill competition and extract the highest possible amount out of the pockets of its customers.

The Standard achieved other ends by its system of creating bogus competitors, besides avoiding public odium. It was enabled by their operation to carry on a competitive warfare cheaply. The bogus independents bought oil from the genuine independents, and proceeded to retail it at the wholesale price. As the genuine independents then came down a peg or two in their retail price to meet this competition, and lowered their wholesale price correspondingly, the bogus concerns bought more at the new wholesale level, and then retailed it at that, and so ad infinitum—or, rather, ad infimum—till the bottom was reached, without their losing a cent in the process. Meantime the Standard virtuously kept its prices up to its own customers in that particular district, and protested against the ruination that was being brought upon the trade by underselling. Thus the function of the "bogus independent," whether company or peddler, was not to make money for the Standard, but to kill off its competitors. It was an instrument of assassination pure and simple. And just as a particularly diabolical murderer arranges the time and manner of his victim's death, so that it shall seem to be self-inflicted, so the Standard arranged by the working of these bogus concerns that the genuinely independent firms outside its own charmed circle should seem to the public to be perishing as the result of their own "cut-throat competition." It was a subtle game, and played with devilish cunning and persistency for many years before it was definitely shown up in its true light. And it was helped by the fact that many of the bogus concerns worked in this way had once been genuinely independent concerns which the Standard had secretly bought up.

It was very difficult indeed for the public to scent the matter out. But the pitcher goes once too often to the well, and the Standard's time is now up. The crash occurred at the Missouri trial. Want of space allows me to quote only a single example of this particular description of rascality. For the sake of simplicity I take the case of a peddler, rather than that of a company:—

Charles E. Farrell testified as a Government witness at the Missouri trial, and no attempt was made to rebut his evidence that he had been a tank-wagon driver for the Standard Oil Company until events took place as follows.—About March, 1899, he was approached at his home at night by the Standard's agent at Troy, N.Y., who told him that McMillan, the Standard's manager at Albany, had some important work for him to do which must be kept entirely secret even from Farrell's own family. At his instance Farrell met McMillan and Mason, the Standard manager at Binghamton, N.Y., who told him that the Standard had competition at Oneonta, N.Y., from the Tiona Oil Company, which had got the bulk of the trade, and that they wanted to get it back, and for that purpose to set the storekeepers fighting with one another. He was directed to go to the Tiona Oil Company at Binghamton, N.Y., and buy twenty-five barrels of oil, and have it shipped to Worcester, as the Tiona would not sell him oil to sell at Oneonta, where it was already doing business. He was then to reship it from Worcester to Oneonta, where he was to peddle it about, putting the sign "Tiona Oil" on his wagon at 8 cents (4d.) a gallon, the same price he had to pay the Tiona for it at Binghamton. Strict secrecy was enjoined as to whom he was working for. Farrell carried out the manœuvre till the merchants cut against one another down to 2 cents a gallon retail, and one even put out a sign: "Free oil; come and get your cans filled." Later Farrell could not succeed in getting any more Tiona oil; then the Standard supplied him with its own oil, cautioning him not to sell too much of it, but only to bell the low price about. Farrell was suspected at last by the Tiona people of being sent by the Standard, but, acting on instructions, denied it through thick and thin.

This nefarious game went on for six months, during which time Farrell carried on his correspondence with Mason at Binghamton by addressing the letters to a man named George Craven at a certain post-office box in Albany, and Craven forwarded them to Mason. Most of the letters sent by Mason in reply were on plain paper and unsigned, but not all. In one which is signed, and which was exhibited in court, Mason says:—

I have your various letters. . . . . Our salesman who visits Oneonta knows nothing whatever of who you are, nor does anyone except those you saw in our office, and under no circumstances whatever do we want anyone to get the slightest hint that we are in any way concerned in this matter. The Tiona people are denying that they have anything to do with it, and claiming that we started you there. Of course, we are denying this, and you must be very cautious, and not allow anyone to try to pump you. . . . You are doing first-rate and carrying out the plan excellently, and very much to my satisfaction. . . . As soon as you have read this, set a match to it and burn it up. . . . Don't tear it up, for some person might get hold of the pieces of paper and put them together, but if you burn it with a match, then it is out of the way wholly. . . .

A further advance in Ferrell's commercial education and moral edification took place six months after the Oneonta episode. The poor fellow, selected no doubt for his blind fidelity, was told by his employer at Albany, McMillan, that a man called Starks at Troy, who had formerly been buying oil from the Standard, was then buying from Dauchy, an independent wholesale dealer, and that he must buy oil from Dauchy too, and cart it round after Starks's wagon and sell it at the wholesale price of 8 cents. In this way Farrell got about half of Starks's trade away from him, when the latter repented of his ways and recommenced buying from the Standard. On the prodigal's return Farrell was called off. I select a peddling case of this sort to justify my assertion that no low trick is too dirty or mean for the Standard's agents; to use a Transatlantic expression, they would take its candy from a two-year-old kid.

Pretended Standard Inventions.

The idea of the "bogus independent" worked as a system is a most ingenious one, and could hardly have been invented by minds of any ordinary calibre. Here, however, the inventive genius of the Trust seems to end. It has been argued on behalf of the Trust that its commercial success has been in part due to the various new technical processes and other improvements which it has introduced—to the benefit alike of the trade and the consumer. For this theory there is no visible foundation. A whole batch of these shadowy claims was disposed of once and for all by Mr. J. D. Archbold's admissions under cross-examination in the Missouri case. Here is the official record of the evidence on these points:—

Q. The Standard Oil Company did not discover the process at all, did it?

A. Oh, no.

Q. The process of making paraffin wax was in existence as early as thirty years ago, wasn't it?

A. Oh, it has been in existence a long time from the coal shales.

Q. Now, in the matter of a great many of these by-products, the "independent" refineries, so called, have done the same as you have, haven't they?

A. Oh, they have, undoubtedly.

Q. Take many of those that you testified to the other day—for instance, cylinder oil. The earliest manufacturers of cylinder oil were at Binghamton, N.Y., were they not—a Mr. Brill?

A. There was a very early concern there—a small concern.

Q. And he is still in business, isn't he, in Philadelphia?

A. I don't know.

Q. Leonard and Ellis were very early manufacturers of cylinder oil; isn't that true?

A. They were—yes.

Q. Then lubricating oil—it was made from the petroleum stock before 1870, wasn't it?

A. It was to an extent—yes.

Q. Spindle oil, I think, is one thing you testified about the other day. Wasn't that first introduced by the Downer Manufacturing Company, of Boston?

A. I think it likely. I do not know definitely. It probably was.

Q. Wool oil—wasn't that sold or manufactured by Paine, Ablett and Co. long before the Standard Oil Company combination or interests got hold of it?

A. It may have been. I could not say.

Q. Was not vaseline made as early as 1860 by chemists in Cincinnati, Ohio, from petroleum products?

A. If it was I never heard of it. I did not know of it.

Pipe-lines for oil transport have been claimed as a Standard invention. As a fact, as early as 1862 a company was incorporated in Pennsylvania for carrying oil in pipes or tubes from any point on Oil Creek to its mouth or to any station on the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad—the first record we have of the idea, which thus suggested itself within a reasonably short time after oil was first struck—namely, in 1859. Now, as we have seen, Mr. Rockefeller only went into the oil trade as his sole business in 1865, though he put money into it as early as 1862. Three short pipe-lines were working in 1863 (Tarbell, Vol. I., p. 17), and they were first made an undoubted success by a man named Samuel van Syckel, who completely revolutionised the oil business in 1864, the year before Mr. Rockefeller definitely took to it, by first pumping oil from the wells to the railroad through a 2-inch pipe at the rate of eighty barrels an hour.

The tank car has also been claimed as a Standard invention. Wooden oil tanks were first built (Tarbell, Vol. I., p. 12) by a young Iowa school teacher almost immediately after oil was first struck, and they continued to be built by him for about ten years, when, finding that iron tanks were bound to supersede him, he retired from that business. Wooden and iron tanks, whether stationary or set on cars, were consequently a very natural development to meet the necessities of the oil-carrying trade, and, as far as I can make out, were probably running in 1869. Tank-ships for the Suez Canal, by the way, were strongly opposed by the Standard in 1887.

Lubricating oil, also claimed as a Standard invention, is due to Mr. Joshua Merrill, a chemist, of the Downer Works. In 1869 he discovered a process for deodorising petroleum, and thus rendering it fit for lubricating purposes. He patented his process, and by it increased the sale of the Downer Works' lubricating oil by several hundred per cent. in a single year (Tarbell, Vol. I., p. 22).

The Trust in the Dock.

Such being the Standard Oil people's methods of dealing with their customers, how have their customers dealt with them? The plain answer to this is that their customers have simply "howled for their blood" for the past thirty-nine years, since the time, in fact, when the beginnings of the great conspiracy came to light in the detection of the South Improvement Company scheme in 1872. Since then the Standard Oil concern has had to face one public prosecution after another and to witness a long series of hostile demonstrations on the part of the public and of public inquiries directed by the Legislature that would have shamed any concern capable of ordinary decent feeling out of existence long ago. In 1879 the Standard Oil Trust was indicted for fraudulent conspiracy in Pennsylvania at the suit of the Petroleum Producers' Union, who were thick-headed and weak-kneed enough to accept a settlement out of court. In 1887 the Standard Oil Company of Ohio was prosecuted by the State Attorney-General—Mr. David K. Watson—for belonging to the Standard Oil Trust, an illegal combination in restraint of trade, and in 1892 judgment was rendered prohibiting it from being a party to any such trust agreement. Ostensibly the liquidation of the Standard Oil Trust followed; in reality it pursued the even tenor of its way. In 1898 the Standard Oil Company of Ohio was again prosecuted by the State Attorney-General, this time Mr. Frank S. Monnett, for failing to obey the 1892 judgment, and the suit, or series of suits, was prolonged by every device on the part of the Standard till his term of office came to an end in January, 1900. His successor, John M. Sheets, suppressed the suits, but matters had been made so hot for the Standard Oil Trust that it took advantage of the lax company law existing in the State of New Jersey to change its style and title (including all its subsidiaries) into that of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. As such it carries on its old conspiracy against public law and the common weal just as before. In 1907 it was again prosecuted in the person of one of its subsidiaries, the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, for the same old charges of unjust and illegal railway discriminations, and condemned on August 3, 1907, to pay a fine of $29,240,000 (£5,848,000). This fine was set aside on appeal on the ground that it had been assessed on the capital of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey instead of on that of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana. On November 15, 1906, the prosecution, already more than once referred to, of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey by the United States Government was commenced in the Eastern Judicial District of Missouri Circuit Court. The company was convicted of conspiracy; it appealed, and the appeal was fixed for hearing in the Supreme Court of the United States during the October term of 1909. It was further postponed, however, by the death of Judge Brewer, of the Supreme Court, at the beginning of the present year, and is now expected to be heard in February next. As the arguments have already been heard on both sides ad nauseam it is not expected that with all its corrupt resources the Standard will be able to prolong the agony much longer than next summer.

In my next article I shall deal with the intrigues and inventions of the Standard Oil Trust in foreign countries.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE NAPOLEON WEDDING.

WHAT some Belgian papers have been saying about the advent of M. Camille Barrère at Turin a few days before the Napoleon-Coburg wedding has given annoyance to M. Pichon. His Department, these papers gave out, wishing to take from the brilliancy of the nuptials, despatched M. Barrère to Turin to make a "demonstration and ungallantly rob a Princess of the ceremonial glory to which she looked forward. He exercised a surveillance at the French Consulate to which the Italian authorities were not insensible." M. Pichon denies that the Ambassador to the Quirinal ever went on the alleged mission. He took the Mont Cenis route for purely personal reasons, and halted at Turin merely to break the journey. There was, in any case, no need for him to exercise "a surveillance" at the French Consulate. The tact and friendliness of the Italian Government and Court to the French Republic rendered them equal to the occasion.

It happened that, in spite of the prohibition from Rome of a "manifestation" bridal, and the blare of the press trumpets, Prince Napoleon did manage to indulge in a political pronouncement of a singularly subtle character. He received a number of journalists the day after the two ceremonies at Montcalieri. A jardinière filled with violets (the Napoleonic flowers) stood beside him. The gentlemen of the French press thought he looked indolent, ill at ease, bothered, and seemed to have lost the thread of his ideas. He never shone as a fluent speaker. This time he spoke in abrupt sentences, for which he excused himself by saying, "I am not under my own roof, and I am very sorry that the mourning of the Princess obliged us to have a quite private wedding." When, however, he had cleared his voice and got well under way, he seemed carried away by admiration for the men who have been governing France all those years and still govern her. He said some flattering things touching the Republic, and confessed to being "drawn towards the Left." Words seemingly having lost all power to bind those who utter them, it hardly matters what any Pretender, whether a Miguel, a Manuel, a Jaimé, or a Napoleon, may say. And then there was the agreement accepted by the Prince to say nothing under any circumstances that could give umbrage to the French Government. One of the journalists expected to hear him add that if he ever entered the Palais Bourbon his seat should be between those of MM. Wilm and Vaillant, and that he hoped to look for inspiration to the eloquent M. Jaurès. This, as the pressman now opines, in talking of the collective interview, "logic commanded." No doubt. But Prince Napoleon may have felt the danger of shining as a logician. He, therefore, abruptly ended his discourse, and going to the jardinière took out as many bunches of violets as there were journalists, and when he had distributed them said, with head slightly down and eyes looking forward from under the brows, "That will remind you of the Other One" (ça vous rappelera l'Autre). With that he risked a little laugh full of meaning, as the journalists thought.

The King of the Belgians has been punctiliously correct. He decided before the signing of the marriage contract that the Princess Clementine should, from the hour of her marriage, completely lose her royal status, the right King Leopold conferred on her of residence in a wing of the Brussels Palace and in the Belvidere Lodge at Laeken. He followed the rule—as the husband is the wife is—of all the European Courts save those of Great Britain and of Spain. There are exceptions in the British peerage in favour of titled widows and peers' daughters. In Spain an untitled Don becomes a duke, marquis, count, and so on, on marrying the heiress to a ducal, marquisal, or comtal, or other title.

The Princess Clementine was granted Royal honours for the last time as she went to sign her marriage contract. King Albert warned his mother that she was to go with the Princess to Montcalieri as her aunt and chaperon only, and to quit Turin by the earliest return train to Brussels.

The Director of the Office for verifying titles and decorations tells me that the late Prince Napoleon was Imperial by courtesy, and not Royal, because the Kingdom of Westphalia had before his birth reverted to the Germanic Empire. His sons are merely princes on the same footing as the Murats. The vote of the National Assembly to abrogate the Empire bars the heirship of the eldest to the titular situation of the late Prince Imperial. A claim made by Prince Murat to Royal rank because his grandfather, Joachim, reigned in Naples would be treated everywhere with derision. The Princess Clotilde is now the only member of the Napoleonic family who has a right to the protocolar prefix of Imperial Highness.

It appears that in 1855 there was endless worry about the protocolar standing of the old King Jérôme and his son. He wished to be invited to the fêtes in honour of Queen Victoria that year. On the principle of "once a king always a king," he refused to give the pas to Prince Albert. Napoleon III. solved the matter by ordering the Duc de Bassano to send him no invitation. The younger Jérôme in being appointed to give his arm on all occasions to the youthful Princess Royal shared her precedence and the Princess Mathilde that of the Prince of Wales. She, in spite of her marriage with a Prince Demidoff, was, as niece of "l'Autre," raised by decree to Imperial rank on the courtesy footing.

If all the loyalty of the late Prince Napoleon was for his father-in-law and the cause of Italy, his young wife found him a terribly unsympathetic and rude husband. His father, on the contrary, was kindly attentive and disposed to "spoil" her Although a freethinker, he humoured her pious instincts. Paris heard with amusement that his first present to her was a gold chalice for her private oratory at the Palais Royal. She highly prized the gift, and thought it a sign from heaven that she must drink to the bottom the bitter cup which her father's will had placed at her lips by dictating a marriage that she dreaded. It is still in her possession, and I see that it was used at the nuptial mass at Montcalieri.

You might fancy that the Chamber feels foolish at having voted condolence to Russia on "Tolstoy's death." It only feels amused. There was a full Chamber, and the pipards had just had their smoke and a talk about Tolstoy's life-works and his good sense in seeking to escape from interviewers, lion hunters, agents for photographic and cinematographic companies, snobs, busy social, school, and other reforms, and from the worldly members of his family. When the vote of condolence was put all hands went up with a swish, and then came down with another. Never was there such unanimity since the National Assembly voted off the Empire and declared it responsible for all the disasters its rashly declared war had brought on France.

Tolstoy's great merit seems to me to have been that he set the Gospels to a new key and followed their teachings to the best of his ability. The unfelt readings of them in churches had so dulled the ear to them as to prevent any stirring impression. We hear them with fresh ears when they come to us through "Resurrection," "Anna Karénine," or some Tolstoyan epistle in pamphlet form.

When Tolstoy determined to expound the Gospels he made over the copyright of the works already published to his wife. His estate he divided between his sons, subject to charges for his daughters and an annuity for himself. This would bar confiscation if the Holy Synod prevailed on the Tsar to banish him to Siberia, and free him from material cares. The second son is the richest, a mine having been discovered on his estate. All like the heavy-swell life as Russians understand it, and are quite unappreciative of their father's works and apostolate. They rank among the best shots in Russia, often come to Paris to amuse themselves, and are counted fine-looking. The daughter Alexandra is Tolstoy's disciple.

I knew in the earlier years of this Republic a double cousin of Leo Tolstoy, the Countess Aline Tolstoy, demoiselle à portrait of the Empress of Russia and a highly educated and distinguée person. According to her account, the Cousin Leo made a wretched figure in the schoolroom. His solitary and moodily wrapt up temper won for him the nicknames of the Bear and the Fakir. The mother of the Countess drew him from a state seemingly of sullen apathy by readings from Xavier de Maistre's story, "La Jeune Sibérienne" and Bernardin St. Pierre's "La Chaumière Indienne." He might have been then seven years old. Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables" completely revolutionised him and threw him into a quite new course from the one he had been following as an officer and a young author.

Most of the high lights of literature are now feminists, and many of the leading scientists. It may be that the Napoleonic rule against feminine members at the Academy of Sciences will soon be abrogated in favour of Mme. Curie. Her candidature for the chair rendered vacant by the death of M. Germer is seriously talked of. It is the one to which M. Curie had been elected a short time before his death. M. Branly, who discovered the action of Hertzian waves on filings of metal, and so may be counted the originator of the wireless telegraph, will also be a candidate. He has in a rare degree those qualities that led to the discovery of radium—scientific divination and patience and a tenacity not to be shaken in following the path which it indicates. He made his great discovery under conditions that must have broken down the courage and perseverance of most savants. When he did so he filled, as he still does, the Chair of Physics at the newly founded Catholic University. His laboratory—a shed of rotten wood—he had to render proof against rain, snow, and wind by his own work and at his own expense in providing the planks, zinc, and other materials on which to work. There was no stove to protect him and his assistant from frost-bites. The assistant came to him ignorant of physics, and had to be taught what to do at every step, but fortunately had a willing mind to learn. M. Branly had only an old-fashioned Leyden jar to work with experimentally in studying the action of Hertzian waves. The Catholic University had to struggle against poverty. Its directing members were theologians and humanists, and perhaps did not see the great importance of physics. At any rate, M. Branly worked entirely alone, and had he been in a great wilderness his mental solitude could not have been more complete. Nobody is less averse to the abrogation of the rule dictated by Napoleon against women at the Academy of Sciences. I hear it said that a majority there are likely to object to a Professor of the Catholic University. To be a Catholic is one thing, to be a "Clerical" is another.

An eminent member of the Academy of Sciences, who devotes himself to natural history, has pronounced against Mme. Curie, because she is a woman. His reason he gave thus: "Les femmes ne doivent s'occuper d'autre chose que de maternité." He is very learned. None the less, his dictum strikes me as being un peu bête. Were it true, our most civilised societies would be chaotic. If women must not enter those sacred temples of art and science at the Institute of France, why do Academicians see unmoved women working in fields, in factories, in workshops, in houses of business, in telegraphic and telephonic offices, and hardly ever paid a wage proportionate to the tasks they execute?

Four or five years ago I asked M. Magnan, who had just retired from the governorship of the Bank of France, what he thought of the lady clerks and other employees there. He had a better opinion of them than of their brother employees. It greatly grieved him that he could not apply the principle of an equal wage for an equal task executed in a way that left nothing to be desired. He knew but very few cases of employees being guilty of levity or inattention, or slothfulness, in the discharge of their functions. They took pleasure in doing their best, apart from the hope of promotion. M. Magnan employed women exclusively as sorters of bank notes. They worked quickly, and their fingers had an unerring touch in feeling the difference between a bad and a good note. The director of the Sorting Department (a man) never knew the discerning tact of a sorteress to be at fault. As accountants he thought the average woman better than the average man, both in quickness and accuracy in calculation. He constantly had women accountants into his own office there to get through arithmetical tasks. Had Jules Ferry remained Prime Minister in 1885 he would have opened a field to women as governmental accountants, adopting the principle of an equal wage for an equal task. He had a mother who, with great courage, took the leadership in family affairs, both in the home and out of the home, in a time of great distress and difficulty. She did so well in this situation as to command general esteem and admiration, and left her two sons under a debt of gratitude which they wished to pay in opening careers to women when they had the power to do so.

One of Ferry's ideas, though it only came into practice a quarter of a century after his fall from office, was to let women serve as curators of museums. The first to pass through the opening that he began to make, Mlle. Pillion, has entered this career in passing brilliantly a test examination. She is an interesting person, old enough to exercise authority over assistants and men servants, is thoughtful, of firm character, and is conversant with all the schools of art represented in French museums. Her capacity as an expert may render her valuable as a curator, now that so many artistic falsities are passed off as true things. It is not very long since that the work of an Odessa goldsmith was palmed off on the Louvre authorities as the tiara of Saïtaphernes.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

JOHN BULL, dear Lady Betty, has always been a tenant till now—he is invariably represented as such; henceforth he is to be his own master. All rejoice at the change but the Peers and their dependants, and they > "Take their leave with signs of sorrow, > Despairing of a job to-morrow."

The feudal system is being removed in large blocks at the moment to the museum of history, where the latest instalments will excite the ever-increasing curiosity of succeeding generations.

. . . . .

Some of the Peers are descendants of men who have bled for the country; more of them are the successors of men who have bled the country. In the circumstances it is not unnatural that the Peers should misquote the lines of Shakespeare to enable them to express adequately the grief which consumes them. For this purpose the Peers have altered them to:—

> "Who steals my purse, steals trash. . . .
> But he who filches from me my veto
> . . . . Makes me poor indeed."

. . . . .

The mistaken impression prevails that the House of Lords and its effects are for sale. The L-rd Ch-nc-ll-r is daily receiving thousands of letters from intending purchasers of either. The permission of the authorities has been obtained for the publication of some of the most curious of these communications.

"My Lord,

"Re House of Lords.

"I am directed by the board of this company to apply to your Lordship for particulars concerning the lease of these premises. My board would be prepared, moreover, to make a substantial offer for the freehold of the property. I am directed to add that the premises would be required for the purpose of an electric theatre. An answer at your early convenience will oblige."

"My Lord,—I understand from the reports published in the New York newspapers that the Woolsack will shortly be for sale. My Itinerant Museum of Curiosities is doubtless known to your Lordship, who will, therefore, be aware that the collection it contains would not be unworthy of so venerable an object. I am prepared to pay handsomely for the Woolsack. On the receipt of a telegraphed message stating the price I will forthwith remit the amount. Were it convenient for your Lordship at some future date to occupy the Woolsack for a performance in the museum I feel confident there would be no difficulty in arranging satisfactory terms."

From Houndsditch comes the following application:—

"My Lord,—As the Members of the House of Lords will shortly have no occasion to use the robes and coronets they formerly wore at State ceremonials, I should be pleased to quote a liberal price for the complete stock. I should esteem it a favour were your Lordship to convey to the members of the House the offer contained in this letter. I need scarcely observe that a more satisfactory result would be obtained by selling the stock of robes and coronets as a whole than by parting with it in separate lots. I also make a specialty of purchasing wigs."

The petition which has been presented in connection with the matter is expressed in the following terms:—

"We the undersigned humbly pray that the premises situate in and about Old Palace Yard and heretofore known as the Upper House of Parliament shall not be let or otherwise disposed of so as to have a depreciatory effect on the neighbouring property, and we your humble petitioners strongly deprecate the establishment of a music hall, skating rink, or dancing saloon in the said premises or on the ground or on any part of the ground the said premises now occupy."

* * * * * * *

The revolt of the "Minor Peers" is one of the main difficulties with which the Opposition have to contend at the moment. The letter which is published below expresses plainly the sentiments of the "intended victims."

"Sir,—They are no 'leaders' who surrender their followers to secure their own safety. Lord Lansdowne and the comparative handful of professional politicians in the Upper House who support him calmly propose to sacrifice our seats to retain some semblance of power for themselves. It is the most shameless betrayal upon record in the whole annals of the history of Parliament in this country. The purely academical resolutions recently adopted in the House of Lords may temporarily deceive the people, but when any measure framed to confiscate our seats comes for a final decision in the House, several hundreds of Peers will vote against it, and they will certainly reject the Bill. The proposal is not only futile, but every Peer knows that we are determined to retain our privileges intact. We are far less opposed to restrictions being imposed upon the exercise of the veto than to the confiscation of our seats, and it is well to announce this boldly and at once. —Faithfully yours,

A 'Minor Peer.'"

Anti-Chamberlainites, anti Balfourites, and anti-Lansdowneites are together an unfortunate combination with which to go to the country.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

Nice. Cimiez.—Winter Palace.—Most up-to-date. Beautiful gardens. High-class chamber music. Tennis courts free. Motor car service to town.—Jos. Agid.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

Steady, Despite Politics—Rally in India Stocks—Yankees less Exuberant—Relapse in Canadian Rails.

On the whole the Stock Exchange suffered little from last week's political developments. Business was considerably curtailed, but prices were well maintained, and in one or two departments, notably that devoted to Home Rails, an actual improvement took place. The House is relieved to know that the general election is to be fought without delay, and the dealers in the Railway market are pleased to hear that the effect of the batch of good dividend announcements expected in January will not be blanketed by polling uncertainties. In the gilt-edged market a welcome feature has been a further sharp rally in India stocks, which derived a fillip from the news that the King intends to attend in person the Delhi Coronation Durbar in 1912. It was just such a piece of news as this that was wanted to change the sentiment towards the stocks of our Dependency. The New Zealand loan has been a fiasco, being apparently overlooked by the public during the political crisis. But the underwriters, who had left with them 93 per cent. of the total, ought to have little difficulty in disposing of as much as they want to part with, for the terms of issue, as I explained last week, are exceptionally attractive. Among the few happenings in the Foreign market has been a sharp recovery in Colombian 3 per cent. Consolidated Bonds. The rise was accompanied by reports that the next coupon would be duly met. It was noticeable, however, that no sympathetic rise occurred in the Railway issues of the Republic, a fact that hardly encourages sanguine belief in any immediate resumption of interest payments on the various guaranteed bonds which have been in default since June last.

Americans have been a less exuberant market, and while relapses were followed by rallies it looked as if selling activity predominated. The recent rumours about listing certain shares on the Berlin and Paris Bourses gained little credence, and were looked upon by some people as stories put about to facilitate unloading. The American market remains in the hands of a comparatively small clique, there being no evidence of any material growth of the demand from the investing public, and those people in the habit of taking the big risks attendant upon speculation in Yankees will probably do well just now to get in and out quickly. Canadian Rails have been a weak market. A fall to 200 was at one time marked in Canadian Pacifics. The absence of an increase in the bonus—prematurely expected in some quarters—was one cause, and another was the publication for the first time for many months of a traffic decrease. It is only what those who followed the chairman's remarks in October should have been prepared for, the fact being that this year's Canadian harvest was not a good one. Of course, moderate decreases, while they may act as a brake upon market enthusiasm, will in no way endanger a reduction in the Canadian Pacific dividend, or necessarily retard the payment of an increased bonus from land. For the company has a giant's strength. With the Grand Trunk, struggling along with the burden of a very heavy capital and minus land assets, the case is different, and the prospect of leaner traffics for a time must further moderate the immediate dividend hopes of the Third Preference stockholders.

RAILWAYS.

Home Rails and Cheaper Coal Contracts—More Cheap Stocks—South-Western Deferred, Midland Deferred, and North-Westerns—The District Metamorphosis.

The Home Railway market continues to show more backbone than for some time past, and it is evident that investors are beginning to be attracted by the excellent improvement shown in the financial results of the various lines in the last two half-years, and the virtually certain prospect of further increases in dividends being made in two months' time. It was reported the other day that the railways were renewing their contracts for steam coal on better terms than previously. Last year the collieries obtained advances of 9d. per ton, but they have just been tendering at 3d. per ton less than previously, and counter offers made by the railway companies at reductions of 9d. to 1s. per ton have in many instances been accepted. The greatly increased outputs of steam coal on the Doncaster coalfield are understood to be the real cause of the fall in prices. The news is of paramount importance to the railway companies, and read in conjunction with the successful efforts being made to reduce expenses by the co-operative system of working, and the demonstration made weekly by the traffic returns that gross receipts are expanding, there is solid ground for shareholders taking confident views. A week ago I dealt with the outlook for the Great Northern, Brighton, and Great Western, and propose now to briefly outline the position of one or two other leading companies whose stocks look cheap.

The South-Western Railway paid for the year 1909 1¾ per cent. on its deferred stock. In June last the company was able, after setting aside £10,000 to reserve (against nil for the first half of 1909) to pay 4 per cent. on the undivided ordinary and preferred stocks, as compared with 3½ per cent. in the corresponding period. This means that to 30th June 2 per cent. was earned on South-Western deferred, but it was not paid, dividends on this stock being distributed in February. For the current half-year the published traffics show an increase for nineteen weeks of £52,700, equal to over £70,000 for the six months. The South-Western, owing to its working arrangement with the Great Western, should be in a position to make important economies of an enduring character in working expenses. Assuming a gross increase of £70,000, it would be possible for one-half to go in increased expenses, and still leave enough to pay a further ¼ per cent. on the deferred, making with the dividend earned to 30th June 2¼ per cent. for the year. The company at December 31 last set aside £20,000 to reserve, and presumably it will next time make at least as large an appropriation. At 46 South-Western deferred on a 2¼ per cent. basis would give a yield of 5⅛ per cent.

The Midland Railway for nineteen weeks publishes a traffic increase of £164,000. This is equal to £223,000 for twenty-six weeks, and as the Midland usually underpublishes to a greater extent than any other line it does not appear unduly sanguine to expect an aggregate advance in the company's gross receipts of £250,000. In the December half of 1909 the dividend on Midland deferred was 3½ per cent., and for the June half of this year the rate was 2½ per cent. To pay at the rate of another 1 per cent. per annum for the half-year takes £194,000. This may be possible, but assuming the company adopts a conservative course and does not divide up to the hilt, there should be no difficulty in distributing an additional ½ per cent., which calls for £97,000. This would make the dividend for the current half-year 4 per cent. per annum, and the dividend for the whole year would be 3¼ per cent. On such a basis Midland deferred bought at 64 would yield over 5¼ per cent.

The North-Western Railway to date has an increase in gross receipts of £165,000, and the prospect is in favour of a total gain of a quarter of a million for the half-year. To pay an additional dividend on Brums at the rate of 1 per cent. per annum for the six months takes £214,436, and accordingly an increase of ¾ per cent. requires £160,000. In view of the success lately shown by the North-Western for reducing working costs a net increase in the amount available for the ordinary stockholders is not unlikely, after allowing for the repetition of last year's allocation of £50,000 to general reserve. A distribution upon Brums for the current half-year of 7¾ per cent. would thus be possible, and it would make with the interim payment of 5½ per cent. a total of 6⅝ per cent. for the whole year. At 134½ the stock would give a yield, on such a dividend basis, of fully 5 per cent.

An outstanding feature of the week has been the eager demand for Metropolitan Districts, and especially the 4½ first preference stock, which rose from 82 to 86. The District has been the wonder of the railway world in the last year or two; both physically and financially it has been transmogrified. In place of an evil-smelling sewer through which ran dirty, dingy trains has been installed a pure-smelling tube through which runs a marvellously frequent service of clean, brightly lit trains. Moreover, the company has for the last few years been bending its energies towards building up a traffic with the outer suburbs, and it is now reaping a rich reward. In place of a company almost hopelessly bankrupt has emerged a new financial enterprise which has funded arrears of interest on its fixed charges and is now showing a useful surplus. The District management has achieved what few people would have thought possible up to a year or two ago. In the June half of this year the company, after meeting the interest on its guaranteed stock, paid at the rate of 3 per cent. on its first preference stock (which thus received the first dividend since 1900). For the first four months of the current half-year the company publishes an advance in net receipts of £18,280, and, allowing for further additions and for the increase of £8,000 in the balance brought in, it is possible that there will be sufficient at December 31 to pay at the full rate of 4½ per cent. on the first preference, the half-yearly interest on which calls for £33,750. At 86, therefore, District first preference still possesses scope for a levelling up.

RUBBER.

The Rubber Position—Jeram—Anglo-Sumatra—Sungei Bahru.

Emerging from what has proved to be only a temporary eclipse, plantation rubber is again selling at a price exceeding that of fine hard Para, Highlands and Vallambrosa smoked sheets both realising at last week's sales over 6s. 7d. per lb. The quotation for the raw article continues to harden, and altogether the market displays a very healthy tendency. Relieved from the heavy impost which the inflated prices of the spring inflicted upon them, consumers seem happier, and a better demand has been ruling. It seems clearer than ever from the present statistical position of rubber that the stories which were current earlier in the year as to the existence of a corner had no basis in fact. The commencement of the heavy rise in prices rested, it is now generally admitted, upon a genuine trade demand; and in anticipation of expected requirements in this country and in America large stocks passed in the early spring into the hands of actual consumers—stocks, the size of which no statistics could show. Tempted by the rise and by the shortness of supplies producers held for still higher prices, and speculators who took a hand in the game assisted the upward movement. But a period of inflated prices does not necessarily prove the existence of a corner, and it would probably be not less untrue to say that a corner existed in, say, Linggi or Anglo-Malay than in the raw commodity. Forced to protect himself, the rubber manufacturer met the position by using larger quantities of low-grade and re-formed rubbers, the displaced quantities which gradually accumulated sufficing in the end, in combination with reduced activity in American trade, to restore the balance between supply and demand.

Mr. Grant Watson, the secretary of the Brazilian Legation at Rio de Janeiro, in his report on the trade of Brazil for 1909, draws attention to the large benefit which Brazil derived last year from the increased price of rubber. The Brazilian exports for 1909 were valued at £18,925,061, as against £11,784,637 in the previous year, but, as Mr. Watson points out, the increase in value in no way corresponds with the increase in quantity, and were it not for the greater export of low-grade rubbers the amount of rubber sent by Brazil to the world's markets would have been actually less in 1909 than in the two previous years. Of particular interest to the investor is Mr. Watson's view of the future of Brazil as a producer:—

From some estates and plantations in Brazil rubber may still be profitably exported owing to its special qualities, but from others the quality of the rubber is such that, given the scarcity of labour and the heavy working expenses in Brazil, high taxation, etc. it cannot be profitably exported when prices fall to meet the Asiatic competition, or to enable demand to keep pace with the already swelling production.

The MOST COMPLETE List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotation will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times." 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

If pessimism pervades the official reports from Brazil, optimism no less certainly prevails in those which emanate from Malaya, and there is a striking contrast between the Brazilian Legation report and the official Budget estimates of the Perak Government now to hand, in which the yield of ad valorem duty payable on rubber exports is calculated on the basis of rubber selling during 1911 at an average price of 7s. 6d. per lb. Advices to hand by the same mail from Colombo report further heavy sales for next year's delivery at 7s. 8d. per lb.

In the share market Sumatra issues have again been in favour, Sialang, Tandjong, and United Serdang all marking small increases during the week. A noticeable inquiry for Strathmore which I recommended recently has raised the price to $\frac{3}{8}$ premium, and as the shares appear to be firmly held by investors a further rise seems probable. Of the smaller Malayan companies none perhaps is in a stronger financial position than Jeram, which, with an issued capital of £50,000, has cash resources amounting to £40,000 and a planted estate of 607 acres. A further 387 acres which are being opened this year will give Jeram close upon 1,000 acres of rubber. The estate adjoins Vallambrosa, and the output for the year 1910-11 is estimated at 10,000 lbs., of which 5,855 lbs. has been secured during the first seven months of the financial year. The shares are now quoted at $\frac{7}{8}$ premium, and the premium this year has been as high as $2\frac{5}{8}$.

The annual report of Anglo-Sumatra for the year ended May 31 last states that the crop for the year amounted to 16,215 lbs., which was sold at an average net price of 8s. $2\frac{1}{2}$d. per lb. It is estimated that 67,000 lbs. of Para and 5,000 lbs. of Rambong will be obtained during the current year. The estate is reported to be in excellent condition, and the company has now 2,404 acres under rubber and coffee, the book value of which works out at only £28 17s. 7d. per planted acre. My readers may remember that this company was included in my list of cheap shares on September 28, and it should be able to enter the dividend-paying stage as the result of this year's operations.

The Sungei Bahru report is also to hand. The directors had under contemplation the acquisition of a considerable further area, and to deal with this they obtained the sanction of the shareholders to increase the capital of the company. Conditions were, however, imposed by the Government in Malacca prohibiting the planting of rubber on this area, and in consequence the board reluctantly withdrew its application, and have not proceeded to issue any part of the increased capital. The planted area is clean and free from weeds, and the trees are reported as being in good condition. No rubber has been or will be collected during 1910, as, in the best interests of the estate, the directors have thought it advisable to delay tapping until next year. The available cash for estate purposes at June 30 was over £26,000, and the directors are of opinion that the whole of the present area (over 3,000 acres) should be brought into bearing on the original share capital of £75,000—say for the very moderate sum of £25 per planted acre. As much of the estate as possible will be planted up with rubber during the current financial year.

Mr. W. H. Glanville, a director of Jequié and West Jequié, who is now visiting the estates of both companies in Bahia, has cabled to the effect that he is quite satisfied with the progress made, and adds that the rains have commenced, and tapping is being carried out. According to the official circulars recently issued, both Jequié and West Jequié will by the end of this month have 2,000 acres cleared and available for systematic tapping.

MINES.

Prices Well Maintained—Rhodesian Prospects—Bucks, Lonelys, and Selukwes—United Exploration Dividend—East Bullfinch—The Carmen Slump.

Considering that there was the political uncertainty to restrict speculative operations the mining markets made a very fair showing last week, which was to be attributed largely to the fact that in no section was there a large account open for the rise. Moreover, the "shops" accorded a measure of support to South African descriptions which cheered professionals, and the close of the week found prices on the up grade. Kaffirs have been under a cloud for some time now, but prices cannot sag for ever, and the approach of dividend time next month will doubtless encourage outside demand for dividend-yielding shares, in which event the principal speculative counters should also experience some further recovery.

One of the factors which helped to maintain Rhodesian prices was the issue of a lengthy circular by the Rhodesia Exploration and Development Company, which, it will be remembered, has recently absorbed the Banket, Shamva Trust, Etna, and Gold Schists companies. A second dividend of 10 per cent. has just been announced in respect of the current financial year, and the company adds that shareholders will shortly be offered valuable rights in respect of the splitting of shares of the Selukwe Columbia and Antelope companies. The position of these and other mining properties in which the Exploration Company is interested is officially reviewed, and the document indicates that the company has some promising assets, but it has been suggested that its present financial methods seem rather like taking money from one pocket and putting it into the other. However, Exploration shareholders are not obliged to use their cash dividend in financing the mines whose shares are to be split. In connection with the latter, there is an idea that, when sub-divided, Antelope and Selukwe Columbia shares will become more popular, in support of which theory the appreciation in Globes after they were split is recalled, but too much importance should not be attached to precedents when considering the prospects of mining shares.

The impression has gained ground during the past week that the insiders mean, if they can, to make the Rhodesian section very lively again, and possibly purchases of the speculative favourites now might result in a moderate profit ere long, but the public should bear in mind that dealing in this market is accompanied by not a little risk. Intrinsic values are difficult to gauge in the majority of Rhodesian propositions. This rather favours a speculative movement, as market men frequently contend, and no harm may be done if those who take a hand in the deal recognise that they are gambling mainly on possibilities. But I am afraid many of the public do not allow for this. They expect too much, and, consequently, are liable to be greatly disappointed, and, having lost money, they are apt to tar all mining shares with the same brush.

When one investigates the position of Rhodesian mines it invariably happens that either there are insufficient data to permit of a definite opinion being formed of intrinsic value or the data indicate over-valuation by the market. When Bucks Reefs were over £3 people were talking them to a still higher price, although on the basis of the official reports the profit in sight on the ore reserves amounted to less than half a sovereign per share. Bucks Reefs have quite recently been down to nearly £1; at the time of writing they are $1\frac{3}{4}$, and are still a decidedly speculative holding. Lonely Reefs, which I criticised about the time they were introduced on the market at a big premium, is another share whose market valuation (at $2\frac{7}{8}$) cannot be justified by any published data, and it would not surprise me very much to see Lonelys follow Bucks Reefs sooner or later. Nevertheless, a bear operation would be risky, as the insiders may have the market fairly in hand.

Bulls of Selukwes have just received another cold douche. Mr. Ackermann, the consulting engineer, has cabled that the developments of the mine having failed to show improvement, he desires the assistance of Mr. Jones, consulting engineer of the Rhodesia Exploration Company, that they may make a joint inspection of the mine with a view to settling the best course to adopt for the future. The Selukwe directors have agreed to this proposal. Two heads should be better than one in such a case, though, of course, no mining engineer, be he ever so proficient, can find payable ore if it does not happen to be in the mine already.

One of the features of the Gold Fields' schedule of investments was an increase in the company's holding of Knights Deep shares. A report of the meeting of the latter concern, held at Johannesburg on the 21st ultimo, has just reached me by mail, and I notice that the chairman not only foreshadowed maintenance of the recent rate of working profit, but added, "It seems probable that in respect of the half-year ending December 31 next it may be possible slightly to increase the dividend paid." Last December Knights Deep declared a dividend of 15 per cent., and a distribution of like amount was made in respect of the half-year ended June last.

Shareholders in the United Exploration Company are to be rewarded for their patience during the recent "Jungle" depression by the payment of a dividend of 10 per cent. (6d. per share). In July last year, it may be remembered, the United Exploration and Gold Coast Investment Companies joined forces, and the directors have just issued a statement of accounts covering the period to the end of September last. The issued capital is nearly £265,000 (in shares of 5s. each), and the report shows a profit of £55,000. The dividend will absorb about £26,500. In the balance-sheet "shares and interests in other companies at cost" figure for £238,808, but their value at September 30, the date of the balance-sheet, was £247,281 at market prices or at a valuation where not quoted. Among the company's more important interests are shares in the Abbontiakoon, Effuenta, Fanti Consols, Prestea Block A, and a few other West African concerns; holdings in the Hong Kong Tramway Company and Auckland Park Real Estate, and a participation in two oil ventures—Lagunitos Oil and Maikop Areas. At 5s. 3d. the price of United Exploration shares is well below the level once touched, and it may be a good time before they fully regain the lost ground, but at the present quotation they are not unattractive as a speculation from a look-up point of view.

So far from having soared upwards like the first-fledged Bullfinch, East Bullfinch shares have slumped. The issue fell flat, and from 1¼ the price dropped last week to 11-16, and is no more than 13-16 now. Work is being commenced on the property this week, but whether or not development will result in the opening up of any quantity of payable ore it is impossible to say. There is, however, the chance that some good assays may be obtained, in which event the shares may easily spurt. On not a few occasions when a new issue has fallen flat there has subsequently been a rush for the scrip, and if there are any bears about of East Bullfinch shares they had better be wary. As to buying the shares, it is quite "a toss-up" whether or not a profit would result. The next Yilgarn flotation, I understand, will be a proposition called the "Bull Ant."

In a note on "The Carmen Gamble" in TRUTH of June 15 last, when the shares were about £2, I warned my readers of their very speculative character, and added that the efforts that were being made to attract the public by means of press paragraphs and the "puffing" of the shares by outside dealers were not features calculated to inspire one with confidence. Carmens are now back under £1, and it still remains to be seen whether or not there is payable ore in any quantity in the company's property. Although it must be a matter of interest to the shareholders, the chairman at the meeting last week did not say how long the company's cash resources might be expected to hold out. According to the reports I have seen of the proceedings, he only said in this connection that "they had plenty of reserve capital, which there would not be much difficulty in placing if they came into fairly good values."

EAST RAND DEBENTURE ISSUE—FIVE PER CENT. CONVERTIBLE BONDS AT 98—A NICE PLUM FOR THE GUARANTORS.

Shareholders in the East Rand Proprietary Mines are now in possession of official details of the proposed debenture issue which was foreshadowed in these columns some time ago. Briefly, the directors' proposal is to create £1,500,000 five per cent. debentures convertible into shares at 5½ during a period of three years from March 1 next and redeemable at par by fifteen annual drawings after the conversion period or at £103 on the company giving six months' notice. The issue is to be made at 98 per cent. in the proportion of £8 of debentures for every thirteen shares held, fractions not to be counted. The bonds will be of the denominations of £100 and £50, but a holder of two or more shares may apply for a proportion of the issue and will be entitled to a fractional certificate. He can either dispose of this in the market or purchase additional certificates to entitle him to one of the bonds to bearer.

The reasons for the debenture issue have already been given in TRUTH. The desirability and attractiveness of the issue are not questioned, but a good deal has been said during the past week regarding the terms of the underwriting agreement. The guarantors are to receive as consideration a commission of 5 per cent. payable in East Rand shares at the rate of five guineas per share. This represents a sum of £75,000. I have heard some strong comments made in market circles respecting this guarantee, and I certainly agree with those criticisms in so far as they assert that such commission is unduly high, having regard to the nature of the security. The interest on this debenture issue is covered more than a dozen times over, and I am assured by City people who should be well informed on such a question that the underwriting in this case could easily have been placed at half the rate agreed upon by the East Rand directors, who, by the way, are admittedly interested in the guarantee through their firms or financial corporations. But no amount of discussion will prevent this big commission being paid. It will require an energetic and powerful opposition to do that, particularly as the meeting to consider the scheme is to be held at Johannesburg and not in London. It is usually difficult to get shareholders to combine to protect their own interests, but I remember one occasion on which an underwriting agreement was cancelled in consequence of a well-led opposition, and that was at a Chartered meeting at Cannon Street Hotel some years ago.

INDUSTRIALS.

L.G.O. ECONOMIES—STRAND HOTEL'S SUCCESSFUL START — HUMBER'S DISMAL REPORT — NEW TAMARUGAL NITRATE RECOVERY—A SOUND 5 PER CENT. DEBENTURE.

The recent rise in the issues of the London General Omnibus Company—the ordinary stock this year has come up from 17 to 60 and the £10 5 per cent. preference has recovered from 2⅞ to 10—proves to have solid basis. During the year ended September 30 last the company suffered a loss in gross receipts of £108,000, but owing to the drastic economies effected by the new management the net revenue balance actually shows a substantial improvement, and the company is in the happy position of being able to wipe off the whole of the arrears on the preference stock. These amounted up to July to 15 per cent., calling for a sum of practically £50,000. The L.G.O. has had a rude buffeting since the change effected in the form of London street traction, and those old shareholders who have stood by the concern throughout its misfortunes well deserve the more cheerful report which the directors will this time submit. The company, of course, has still a long road to travel before it gets back to its former prosperity, but it looks as if bedrock has at last been reached.

The Strand Hotel, Limited, which was opened just over a year ago under the auspices of the all-conquering Lyons, has made an auspicious start. The report made up to September 30, and covering 54½ weeks, discloses a profit of £41,700. After deducting interest on the 4½ per cent. debenture stock, £7,500 for depreciation and redemption fund, and setting aside £3,000 to reserve, the balance remaining is sufficient to bring up the dividend on the preferred ordinary shares to 9 per cent. for the year (a rate which absorbs £12,100), to pay a similar amount to the holders of the deferred ordinary shares—which work out at about 240 per cent.—and to carry forward a sum of £2,200. The £1 preferred ordinary, it may be explained, rank first for non-cumulative dividends of 7 per cent. per annum, and are to take one-half of the profits remaining after paying to the deferred shares a sum equal to 7 per cent. on the preferred ordinary shares and making provision for a reserve fund. The present price of the preferred is 1 17-32, at which the yield is 6 per cent. Prospects are bright enough to make them a likely commercial holding. The 4½ per cent. first mortgage debenture stock at 97 yields 4⅝ per cent. It may be regarded as a sound investment, but fairly priced. The success of the company has induced it to extend its operations, and it is announced that a site has been acquired bordering on Regent Street upon which it is intended to erect a second hotel on similar lines to the Strand Palace.

So far the shareholders of Humber, Limited, have derived no tangible benefit from the reconstruction carried through in February, 1909. According to the report for the nineteen months since that date the trading profit amounted to £37,300, of which £21,600 is absorbed by maintenance of plant, tools, etc., and £11,000 goes in interest, law costs, and directors' and auditors' fees. The balance left is £5,000, and that is all that can be appropriated for depreciation. Thus the preference interest remains in arrear since the reconstruction. The directors explain the poor results as being largely due to an exceptional outlay on designing and experimental work (carried out with the object of re-establishing the company's goodwill). The report speaks rather hopefully of the future. But for the present it is hard for the shareholders to conceal their disappointment at this Barmecide feast.

Following upon the batch of excellent nitrate producing companies' reports published in the last few weeks is that of the New Tamarugal. This Tarapaca concern was established in 1889, and has had a stormy career, involving two successive writings down of capital, but in the last three or four years it has been doing comparatively well. For 1908-9 the ordinary dividend was passed, but for the twelve months ended July 31 last a distribution of 7½ per cent. has been made, thus equalling the rate paid two years ago. In the year 1908-9 production represented only nine months' work, and profit was taken on only 294,513 quintals of nitrate sold, out of a total make of 670,000, whereas in the past year the quantity of nitrate manufactured was 841,880 quintals, but owing to the unusually large unsold stock brought forward profit is taken on 1,075,055 quintals. The trading profit to July 31 last was £64,660, against £20,588, but the profit on exchange was only £985, as compared with £7,473. A sum of £20,000, or almost as much as is distributed in dividend, has been added to the reserve fund, raising it to £40,000, which exceeds by £2,500 the amount of the outstanding mortgage debentures. The New Tamarugal has an estimated life with free production of thirty-five years. In view of the more promising outlook for the nitrate industry the company's ordinary £1 shares standing at about 19s. look worth purchasing as a speculation.

An industrial issue made in the last few days which should appeal to those in search of a sound 5 per cent. investment was that on behalf of the British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Limited. The issue took the form of £200,000 5 per cent. mortgage debenture stock at par, forming the first portion of a total authorised issue of such stock of £500,000. The new scrip constitutes a charge upon property and assets having a certified value of £1,836,985, subject only to an existing issue of £500,000 4½ per cent. first mortgage debenture stock. It is redeemable at par on January 1, 1925, or after December 31, 1915, at 102½. Interest is payable January 1 and July 1. The company dates from 1897, and has had a prosperous career. Profits for the past four years averaged £138,872, of which the service on the first debenture stock calls for £22,500, and that on the present issue of 5 per cent. debenture stock will take £10,000, or together £32,500. It will thus be seen that there is an ample margin behind the new stock.

A SNARE FOR SMALL INVESTORS.

The following advertisement has lately appeared in the Dundee Advertiser, and probably also in other newspapers:—

> All Post Office and Savings Bank depositors will hear of Something to their Advantage by communicating with Henway, Lang and Co., 11, Bow Lane, London, E.C.

This was apparently used as an accommodation address—at any rate, a person who wrote to Henway, Lang and Co. received in reply a circular headed "The British Columbia Mines, Land, and General Finance Company, Limited," dated from 6, Cato Road, Clapham, S.W., and signed "Arthur Luke, special representative." With the circular were enclosed a booklet, styled a "prospectus," and other papers relating to the above-mentioned company's "instalment investment certificates," which Mr. Luke strongly recommended as "a sound and lucrative means of investing savings." In the booklet (which is not a prospectus within the meaning of the Companies Act) there is, first of all, an alluring account of the "highly remunerative and safe field for investments, particularly in land and mortgages on land, which Canada presents," and it is then explained that the company, whose head office is 62, London Wall Buildings, E.C., has "inaugurated" a system to enable British investors of small means to participate in such investments. They are to do this, it seems, by paying quarterly or yearly subscriptions to the company on certificates issued for periods of ten, fifteen, or twenty years, at the end of which periods the whole of the cash so paid is returnable with accumulated compound interest at 4½ per cent. per annum for ten years, 4¾ per cent. for fifteen, and 5 per cent. for twenty years. Tables are given to show the amount of the interest on subscriptions from £1 per quarter upwards. The conditions provide, inter alia, that, except in the event of the death of the subscriber, the subscriptions shall not be withdrawable until the maturity of the certificates. As to security:—

> The certificates require the company, after each actuarial valuation of the amount of the liabilities under the certificates, to deposit with trustees as specific security for the certificate holders, title deeds of real estate taken at the appraised value, or mortgages or approved trustee securities or cash for an amount at least equal to the reserve required to meet the company's liabilities under certificates, as shown by the actuarial valuation.

In considering a scheme of this kind one naturally wants to know what resources the company possesses, and under what auspices it is being launched. With regard to the first point, I was most unfavourably impressed by the statement in the prospectus, "Registered capital, £100,000." In the case of insurance companies the law now makes statements in that form illegal, unless the amount of the capital paid up is also given. In the case of this British Columbia Mines, Land, and General Finance Company, an inquiry at Somerset House reveals the fact that down to August 26 the number of £1 shares allotted was only 5,147, so that the actual cash capital—supposing all the shares were fully-paid up—was a mere fraction of the registered or authorised capital of £100,000. The company was only registered on June 10, but by August 26 two of the original directors, Mr. Thomas E. Crispe, K.C., and Sir T. Brooke Hitching had resigned. At present the directors are:—

> Major General Sir Norman R. Stewart, Bart., C.B. (chairman).
> Lewis R. Abbey-Williams, barrister-at-law.
> Sir William B. Hudson, K.C.I.E.
> E. M. Lacey, M.Inst.C.E., M.I.Mech.E., M.I.E.E.
> John Leese (managing director).

It is a list calculated, perhaps, to appeal to the small investor, but it did nothing to remove the impression produced on my own mind by the "registered capital" dodge. Major-General Sir Norman R. Stewart, Bart., C.B., was the chairman of the Vigilant Investment Registry, Limited, an outside broking concern, which, after a brief but inglorious career, ending in its failure to meet its obligations, is now being compulsorily wound up under an order made by Mr. Justice Neville on October 25. The secretary of this concern was a Mr. Arthur Luke, who is presumably identical with the "special representative" of the British Columbia Company. Compulsory liquidation has also recently terminated the operations of the Great Winchester Exploration Syndicate, Limited, another company of which Sir Norman Stewart was a director. His other directorships have included a rubber company—which, if I remember rightly, failed to go to allotment—and the Consolidated Oilfields of California, one of the wild cats promoted by Mr. Carter West, whose shares have been pushed through the agency of the late McKinley, Alexander and Sons' bucket shop and other concerns which have received attention in TRUTH. Among Sir Norman's varied activities, however, I have no recollection of anything which would specially qualify him for a Canadian land investment business. The same remark applies to Sir William Hudson, who is chiefly known to me as a director of a number of rubber companies which I have had occasion to criticise very severely, among them being the Castilla, in the flotation of which McKinley, Alexander and Sons played a part, and the Ceylon-Travancore and the Ceylon Rubber, Tea, and General Produce, which emanated from another bucket shop. With Mr. Abbey-Williams and with Mr. E. M. Lacey I am unacquainted, but the name of Mr. John Leese, the managing director of this British Columbia Co., coupled with the appearance in the shareholders' register of Mr. Charles Leese, J.P., inevitably recalls the deplorable history of the Provincial Homes Investment Co. In addition to the directors, the prospectus names Mr. Evan Hayward, M.P., and Dr. Charles Leach, M.P., as "trustees for certificate holders."

Canada is a prosperous country, but there, as elsewhere, investments in land need to be made with great discrimination, and I should not myself be inclined to rely upon the skill and experience of this board for the successful conduct of such a business. Even, however, if the board were composed of men of high financial standing and special experience in Canadian land business, I should still regard the scheme of "investment certificates" as most objectionable, and the method of roping in savings bank depositors as extremely reprehensible. It is in my opinion utterly wrong that such people should be tempted to transfer their savings from the safe custody of the Post Office or Trustee Savings Banks to the keeping for long fixed periods of a mushroom company, which talks vaguely of contemplated investments in land and mortgages on land in Canada. In its essence the scheme is barely distinguishable from those of a number of companies whose modes of business were considered when the Assurance Companies Act of 1909 was passed. That Act brings within its provisions (one of which requires a deposit of £20,000 in the Court of Chancery) any company engaged in "bond investment business; that is to say, the business of issuing bonds or endowment certificates by which the company in return for subscriptions, payable at periodical intervals of two months or less, contracts to pay the bondholder a sum at a future date." Is it, I wonder, owing to this that the British Mines, Land, and General Finance Company explains that it does not issue certificates with subscriptions payable more frequently than once a quarter—though it adds that people wishing to "invest" once a month can do so by spreading the amount over three quarterly certificates, dated for three successive months?

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

"L'INTERMEDIAIRE."

It is surprising that our native bucket-shop philanthropists do not demand protection from the foreign competitors who nowadays come over here to take the bread out of their mouths. The matter deserves the attention of the Tariff Reform Commission. Even a Free Trader like myself can see that this really is a case in which, if people are to spend money at all, it is much better that they should spend it at home than send it abroad. The latest intruder in this industry is operating under the curious title of "The 'Intermediary,' English Agency of 'L'Intermédiaire,' Paris, French Bankers, 91, Cannon Street, London, E.C." According to the letters and circulars issued from that address by "Mr. Augustus Tory," the manager, "L'Intermédiaire"—which is seemingly at once a bank and a weekly newspaper—has its head office at 6, Rue Favart, Paris, and more than a score of continental branches. It conducts "genuine dealings in French Rentes," yielding an average profit of 50 per cent. per annum, and the English public are now offered the privilege of sharing in this lucrative business by subscribing sums from £10 upwards—"no further liability." They are not to suppose that they are being asked to join in a gamble. Oh, dear no! "We never speculate . . .; the profits are made by investment; . . . there is not the slightest risk to capital; . . . the combination makes a loss impossible; . . . profits are certain and are paid promptly"—and so on and so forth. There is a long-winded dissertation on "the prudent method of these monthly operations," ingeniously calculated to befool the average greenhorn, but owing to what I think must have been a slip of the pen it is incidentally revealed that the "prudent method" consists of 1 per cent. cover deals, and that simple fact renders comment almost unnecessary. As, however, I have been asked for advice by a potential investor, I will suggest one point for his consideration. It is claimed that this system of "absolutely safe investment," returning "certain" 50 per cent. profits, has been worked for three years; also that "every member voluntarily brings in upon an average at least five new members." Can anybody in his senses really suppose that the French financial geniuses running this wonderful business would after piling up profits for three years, worry themselves to obtain remittances of £10 or so from small investors in England and Scotland when—if their story would bear investigation—they could get unlimited amounts from any number of big capitalists?

MR. COHEN AND THE CANARIES.

A delightfully ingenuous proposition is made in a circular sent out by M. James, secretary, the Canary Islands Development Syndicate, Regent House, Regent Street, W. James begins by asking permission "to draw your attention to Argentum, a 'private limited syndicate' (sic) which has been formed to open up and enlarge on (sic) the imports and exports from and to the Canary Islands." I learn from the Financial Times that an "Argentum Syndicate" was registered a month ago with a capital of £3,000, but after drawing attention to this concern James winds up by urging you to take "at least 500" £1 shares in the Canary Islands Development Syndicate, which is apparently not yet incorporated. It is stated that "this syndicate"—which of them is meant can only be guessed—has entered into a contract with Mr. A. Cohen, of Regent House, who will return to the Canary Islands "as soon as sufficient working capital is subscribed;" that it is "confidently anticipated" that the major portion of the fruit and vegetable trade will fall into the hands of "this syndicate"; and that in addition profits will be made from a concession for a motor van mail delivery, from motor 'buses and cabs ("badly wanted in the islands") and from "a sort of New River Company for household and irrigation purposes"! There is I suppose no limit to the vagaries of investors, but it certainly is difficult to believe that anybody will subscribe for shares on the strength of this extraordinary circular.

AZTEC VENTURES, LIMITED.

Recently an advertisement in the Daily Telegraph announced that two or three gentlemen with £100 were required in connection with a "small flotation syndicate for fully developed big mining proposition showing high gold values." In reply to an application for particulars a correspondent received a letter signed by Ronald King as director of the Aztec Syndicate, Limited (in course of incorporation), 6, St. Swithin's Lane, E.C. Mr. King stated that the syndicate's nominal capital was £2,000 in one shilling shares; that it proposed to deal almost immediately with a group of Mexican mines having actual ore in sight of an aggregate value of £1,000,000 sterling; and that from this source alone a profit of several hundreds per cent. should be made. This was followed up by a letter from Charles Rutlidge, director, who more modestly estimated a dividend of 50 per cent. per annum on the shares of the syndicate, but in consideration of an investment of £100 he undertook "to reserve an appointment abroad at a minimum salary of £250 per annum, rising annually to £400," and pending this appointment offered "a position in a cinematograph company immediately forming" at £2 per week with 2½ per cent. of the profits. The applicant wrote to me on the subject, and as I never recommend investments in concerns which offer a salaried post as an inducement, I advised him accordingly. The syndicate, I have since ascertained, has now been registered as Aztec Ventures, Limited, and I shall be interested to learn whether the above-mentioned directors are identical with Bertram Ronald King (formerly manager of Delyannis's Atlas Banking Corporation) and Charles Schaeffer Rutlidge, who was associated with King in the promotion of the Anglo-Continental Investment Syndicate, Limited, which was compulsorily wound up last year.

Duncan Forbes and Co.

In the place of the circulars which they have distributed so lavishly, Duncan Forbes and Co., are now sending out a sheet entitled "Our Weekly," which with characteristic generosity they undertake to post to you "regularly and free of charge." It is, of course, simply a flat-catching advertisement of "our complex stock deals," and the other devices with which the individual calling himself Duncan Forbes and Co. imposes upon the credulity of the foolish public. I have so often exposed the fantastic absurdity of his pretences that it is hardly necessary to refer to them again, but for the benefit of new readers I may mention that this bucket-shop keeper has himself more than once demonstrated the bogus character of the so-called "deals" by furnishing accounts based on the egregious delusion that he was "dealing" in $100 shares when the securities in question were really £100 stock.

NEW ISSUES.

The Anglo-Continental Supply Company, Limited, has been formed to acquire and to further develop in France and other continental countries the business of Mr. Michel Cahen, of Paris, which is carried on under the name of Les Etablissements "Au Planteur de Caïffa." Originally confined to the sale of freshly-roasted coffee, the business has been extended to other groceries and the retail organisation now comprises 1,314 depots, branches, and agencies in France. The profits have increased from £125,134 in 1907 to £169,106 in the year ended June last. The capital is £1,600,000 equally divided into 8 per cent. cumulative preference and ordinary shares of £5 each. All the ordinary and 24,000 preference shares are taken by the vendors and the remaining 136,000 preference shares are now offered for subscription.

The Ferghana Oil Fields, Limited, has been formed to acquire the petroleum estate, known as Maily-Say, of the late Prince Khilkoff, formerly Russian Minister of Highways. The estate was granted to the Prince by an Imperial grant for a period of forty years, of which there are still thirty-seven years to run. It is stated that subject to the number of Russian and English directors being equal, and other formalities, the Russian Government will as a special favour agree to the transfer of the concession to an English company. The property has been reported upon for the G. M. Oilfields, Limited, by Mr. J. R. Falkowicz. The capital of the company is £750,000 in £1 shares, and the present issue is of 600,625 shares, of which 350,625 will be allotted in part payment of the purchase consideration, and 250,000 are offered for subscription.

Subscriptions are invited by the Batu Matang Rubber Plantations, Limited, for 35,000 shares of £1 each and £35,000 6 per cent. first mortgage convertible debentures. Holders will have the right, until December 31, 1913, to convert the debentures into shares at par. Applicants for shares will be entitled to the call at par of one of the unissued shares of the company for every two shares allotted to them. The share capital is £90,000, and the company has been formed to acquire and work rubber estates in the State of Perak, F.M.S., comprising 1,289 acres, of which 320 acres are planted with 38,800 Para rubber trees.

Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, and Co. are authorised to receive subscriptions for £600,000 four per cent. first mortgage stock of the Midland Railway Company of Western Australia. The price of issue is 95 per cent. The stock, which is part of an authorised amount of £700,000, will be secured by a specific first mortgage on the railway and 1,922,850 acres of land, and also on 80 per cent. of the instalments (amounting to £306,000) remaining due for land already sold. The proceeds of the issue will be used to pay off the existing guaranteed debentures, and as to the balance for the provision of additional rolling stock.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Foxey.—There is $30,750,000 Common stock. This was not publicly issued, hence there is no quotation, and no dividends are being paid.

Puggy.—Under good management and when the line is fully opened it ought to meet preference charges. As a lock-up the shares are worth holding.

Tyrone.—1 and 2. After the sharp rise that has occurred it would be wise not to miss the opportunity of taking a profit.

Mines.

A. B. C.—They should all have some recovery when market conditions improve. Possibly No. 2 may declare a small dividend next month, but all depends upon the directors' policy in regard to an increase of plant. Anxious Widow.—In an active market they might have a moderate recovery, but holding must be considered very much of a speculation.

Brislee.—A purchase might yield a moderate profit in time, but would, of course, be speculative.

Cheltenham.—It might be as well to sell Nos. 1 and 3 on any moderate advance. Holding No. 2 must be considered an absolute gamble.

Green Ways.—Doubtless the Gold Fields sold at a price well above that now ruling. I should be inclined to hold rather than accept the present quotation.

Jack.—1. Hold for a recovery. 2 and 3. Sell in the event of a moderate rise. Jock.—1. They should have some recovery in time, but it is inadvisable to put too much money into any one concern. 2. I am not greatly attracted by them at present. 3. Prospects seem very poor.

Mancunian.—All very speculative, and at the moment I see no reason to expect much improvement in any of them. Mayo.—You could make a more attractive selection.

Owl.—If your shares are not fully paid you are legally liable for the call, and even forfeiture of the shares will not release you from that liability.

Petrarch.—If you had read Truth regularly you would not have needed to ask. On more than one occasion during the current year the position of the concern was dealt with in my notes, and it was shown that the shares were overvalued. Developments in the mine have been less satisfactory of late, the output has been lowered, and the rate of distribution is to be reduced. Even now the shares do not appear to be really cheap.

RATIGAR.—In my opinion your money could be much more hopefully employed than in either of the shares named.

SIRRON.—See first part of answer to "Jock" above. SNAPSHOT.—Hold all for recovery when market conditions improve. SNOOKS.—1. Unfortunately the output has had to be reduced, but at the present price a purchaser should not do badly. A dividend of 3d. per share is payable on the 25th inst. They are quoted on the Stock Exchange, and are a fairly free market. 2 and 3. These give a high yield—over 15 per cent. per annum—and a purchaser must be prepared to face some risk. I prefer No. 3.

TESS.—Better exchange into something with more immediate prospects of improvement.

WOLF.—1. A fair speculative lock-up for appreciation and dividends. 2. These also have speculative possibilities. 3. A purchase would be very much of a gamble. If you buy, do not hold for too large a profit. 4. I have heard no special reason beyond market depression, and should be inclined to hold for recovery. 6. Hold these also for better market conditions. WITWITE.—1 2. 3. You could make a much more promising selection for purchase than these.

Mixed Securities.

A. C. K.—Lever Bros Five per Cent. First Preference should meet your requirements. AARONS.—1. In time they may recover to the price you paid. 2. Hold. 3. These might be sold. ANXIOUS.—1. It is impossible to estimate the life of such a concern. 2. There are good reasons why the shares are low. Sell what you have. 3. Very much of a gamble. AUSTRAL.—1. The business is confined to that of cork merchants. The shares are a fair business risk. 2. See rule 2. 3. Metropolitan Electric Trams Five per Cent. Debenture Stock should suit.

BILLY.—1. A bucket-shop repeatedly condemned in TRUTH. 2. A risky debenture. Better sell. 3. Worth keeping. BETTY.—You are apparently being well advised. Both the stocks named are thoroughly sound and suitable.

CAKE.—1. New York Telephone Four and a Half per Cent. bonds, Alabama, New Orleans and Texas Railway Five per Cent. C debentures and Erie R.R. Four per Cent. prior lien bonds. 2. Grand Trunk Railway Five per Cent. First Preference, Southern Alberta Land Five per Cent. debenture stock, and Dominion Iron and Steel Five per Cent. bonds. CROOKES.—1. I have heard nothing since the prospectus. 2. See first answer to "Dunara." 3. Speculative, but I see no reason at present to advise a sale.

DUNARA.—1. London Ventures are a good speculative holding, but until promotion business revives the company cannot make any heavy profit. It has, I understand, some good business in hand, but I cannot forecast dividends. 2. Hold for the present. 3. Sell. DESPERANDO.—I do not look for any material recovery at present, but you should hold the stock. You could not have a safer investment. DUNOLLY.—I do not regard either as very attractive. See reply to "Slipper."

G. H.—1. A fair speculation for a small profit. 2. I do not care to recommend these. 3—4. See Rule 2.

HEW.—1. I have not seen a price for the shares. 2. I do not look for a return to the price touched a few years ago. The shares now look fully valued, having regard to the uncertain character of the business. 3. Yes, though they are, of course, only a gamble.

J. B. MOUNTFIELD.—1. See rule two. 2. These shares are sound, but look high enough. MOPS.—No market here for 1 and 2, and no particulars available in the standard reference books. The only occasions I have come across them was when the issues were being peddled out by the Investment Registry, Limited. With my opinion of this concern you, as a regular reader of TRUTH, are no doubt familiar. 3. A new undertaking. At present the bonds must be regarded as essentially speculative. JACK.—1. Negotiations are on foot to obtain a settlement, but there is nothing to communicate at present. Unless you are prepared to wait indefinitely it might be best to cut your loss now. 2. They are a speculative holding even at the present reduced price.

KILRY.—1. They should be regarded at present simply as a speculation. I can add nothing to the prospectus information. 2. I see no reason at present to expect much of a decline, but unless prepared to face some risk you had better realise. 3. Am afraid prospects remain poor, and would be inclined to cut the loss. 4. A moderate rise is probable, but I would hesitate to advise a sale of 5, which is a splendid investment.

MONTSNOTTE.—1. Shares at this stage very much of a speculation. You omit to tell me whether you are a holder or not. If not, better await the result of the first year's trading. 2. The company appear to be steadily making up leeway. 3. Hold for dividends. MITE.—You could get safety and a yield of practically 4 per cent. by buying Merchant's Trust Four per Cent. Perpetual debenture stock.

OAKBANK.—The two you name would be suitable, also Scottish American Investment Company preference.

ROSC.—1. Sound enough, but not the strongest concern in the group. 2 and 3. See answers under "Insurance." 4. For your purpose the Birkbeck Bank would be quite suitable. 5. You might make a better selection. 6. Central Uruguay Eastern Extension Five per Cent. Preference would be fairly secure. RECHAB.—I do not care for No. 2. Nos. 1 and 3 appear to be fairly secured, but the accounts of the company are published in such a form that it is not possible to make a close examination of the position. 4. Hopeful speculation from a lock-up point of view. No. 5 is a sound industrial, and No. 6 is one of the best in its group, but necessarily very speculative. ROBIN.—1. Sell. 2. A good industrial, but I cannot predict any material further rise. 3. I see no reason to advise a purchase.

SEYCHELLES.—1 Yes, they are a good holding for dividends. 2-4. Fair holdings for dividends, but more speculative than No. 1. Nos. 5 and 6 are two of the soundest concerns in the oil group. I cannot attempt to forecast the fluctuations in the shares, but taking a broad view I do not regard present quotations as inflated. SLIPPER.—I would suggest Anglo-Argentine Tramways Five per Cent. debenture stock, Metroplitan Electric Tramways Five per Cent. debenture stock, and Royal Mail Steamship Five per Cent. debenture stock. See also this week's article. SURVEYOR.—No. 4 is practically an untried concern. But it appears to have fair prospects. 2. The bonds look good enough amongst 5 per cent. securities. SAN TOY.—In place of 3 put Metropolitan Electric Trams Five per Cent. debenture stock. The other two are suitable.

TANJON.—1. A high-class investment, worth keeping. 2. Sell on any advance. 3 One of the soundest in the oil group, and the shares are worth holding.

UNO (Woking).—1. I am not greatly attracted by any of the South Africans named. 2. Read this week's notes regarding New Tamarugal Nitrates.

W. H.—1. The prospectus read well, but practically nothing has transpired since on which to form an opinion. The shares at this stage are necessarily very much of a gamble. 2. Fair as a speculative lock up.

Rubber.

ATTAREE.—Of your list I should recommend Malacca Pref. and United Serdang for present purchase in preference to the Java companies. A circular explaining the Madagascar position is expected shortly. Hold the other. See Rule 2. ANTIPHLOGISTINE. Hold Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 for substantial improvement. The others are developing slowly. See Rule 2. AWAKE.—Hold 4 and 5. Take a small profit on Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and buy Tremelbye and Strathmore. ALEX.—1. Should show satisfactory development early next year. Calls cannot exceed 5s. per share at intervals of two months. Worth holding. 2. It is speculative, of course; but there is nothing wrong with the position. ACCOUNTS.—Hold Malaccas and Asiatics. Buy Tremelbye and Strathmore; the former for immediate dividends with a good chance of capital appreciation. See TRUTH, October 19 and November 16, for details. ACTIVE.—1. Should earn a dividend next year. 2. Tapping commences 1911. 3. Very good. ALLENDALE.—Doranakande is a cheap share, and a dividend-payer.

BRAINTREE.—Exchange Nos. 1, 2, and 5 for Strathmore and Taiping. Hold the others for your figures. BRYN.—Hold No. 1. Watch for an opportunity to sell the others. BRIX.—Extensions on Kuala Pahi are proceeding, and it is proposed gradually to increase the planted area to 1,000 acres. The shares carry a guaranteed dividend, and are worth locking up. BACHELOR.—Neither is first-class, but both are cheap at present prices, and worth holding for a profit. BALU.—1. You are quite right. Dividends will be small for several years, but the shares should improve in value as the rubber grows older. 2. I have a high opinion of Sumatra Para, and although the premium is higher the return should be satisfactory. BAR.—The limit, I am afraid, is too high, but the company is making a good business. Hold for a substantial recovery. BEVERLEY.—Nos. 2 and 3 should reach your figures again. No. 1 is more speculative, but in view of the altered outlook the price you paid was high. Hold for substantial recovery. BRITOMART.—1. Brieh should earn a dividend next year. Tapping has commenced. Negotiations for an extension of the estate are now pending. 2. Yes. BALDIE.—Both poor. Instead of averaging buy Taiping. BEERE.—1 and 2. Sell on any improvement, and exchange for Tremelbye and United Serdang. See reply to "Grantown." 3. Kinta Kellas is now producing, and should soon pay a dividend. 4 and 5. Next year. 6. Northumberland is a good purchase. The returns are in advance of the prospectus estimate, and a dividend should be forthcoming for the current year.

CO. CLARE.—Hold Merliman for steady appreciation. Year ends December 31. Tapping commences 1912. Small revenue from tapioca meanwhile. COUNTRYMAN.—Prye is a sound holding, and should show you a profit. A good purchase at present price. CASTLE.—1. See reply to "Bar." 2 and 3. Speculative shares, likely to do well in active markets. Tapping has now commenced and the latest news is favourable. Hold for improvement. CALX.—Hold b for a profit and a for 55s., at which price I should exchange for a cheaper share. CALEY.—A Rambong proposition with no immediate prospects, but not worth selling at present price.

DERRY.—Both in good hands, and worth holding. Buy Tremelbye and Strathmore. DUBLIN.—1. A sound holding for steady appreciation. 2. See TRUTH, October 5, for details. DEZANO.—1. Hold Rubber Estates of Johore for further improvement. 2. Sell this and buy Taiping. 3. Hold. See Rubber Notes.

EMBASSY.—Strathmore is quoted daily in the Financier.

FIPS.—I should select Glen Bervie and Johore Rubber Lands.

GRANTOWN.—A sound dividend-payer, but the acreage valuation is so high that there is no room for any great rise. For capital appreciation combined with present dividends Tremelbye should make a good purchase.

HEM.—1. An exchange for Taiping would probably give better results. 2 and 3. Hold for a steady recovery. HANTS.—Well chosen, and they should eventually show you a substantial profit.

JANUS.—1. It is a Singapore local company. 2. No. 3. I cannot advise on local companies. 4. Your share certificate should state the par value. There is no quotation in London, nor can I find one in the Straits newspapers. 5. No. 6. It looks like a planting proposition, with a 6 per cent. dividend guaranteed by the promoters. Prospects depend almost entirely upon management. J. D. (New Ross).—Write to the company, as the brokers suggested. The delay is inexcusable, but, of course, you are not prejudiced if the shares have been registered in your name.

KENT.—A sound holding. For present purchase I prefer Tremelbye. KINGSLEY.—Average Nos. 2 and 3. No. 1 is worth holding for recovery.

LEE.—1. Instead of averaging, buy Tremelbye. 2. No. 3. Merlimau is a good purchase.

MONTSNOTTE.—Tremelbye, United Serdang, and Strathmore. MYFANWY.—A very sound list. All worth holding as investments. MANCUNIAN.—Not recommended. MOVILLE.—In order of merit I should say 3, 2, 1. Buy Tremelbye. MARTIN.—1. Not a first-class property, but a purchase at present price should show a good profit say, within twelve months. 2. Your suggested limit is too high. For capital appreciation Strathmore should suit you better, or, if you require immediate dividends, Tremelbye.

NOVEM.—1. No prospect of immediate dividend. 2. Cheap at present price. 3. Yes. 4. No. 5. Somewhat slow. NESTOR.—1. I will include them in a future table. See my table of September 28. 2. In early years of production 2s. per lb., gradually falling to 1s. 3. Yes. NEB.—A very good list. Take a small profit on Nos. 1 and 2, and exchange for Tremelbye. Hold the others. NEEDHAM.—Nos. 1, 2, and 3 are very speculative, and require too much watching to make good holdings for a resident in Java. Exchange for Tremelbye and United Serdang. No. 4 is sound and excellently managed, but is not likely to show any great appreciation. Hold No. 5. Take half of your fine profit on No. 6 NORTH.—See Rubber Notes. Of the two Jequié is the better purchase.

ORMIDALE.—I expect a gradual appreciation, but not more perhaps than may follow a purchase of Tremelbye and Strathmore, and you might possibly do better by making the exchange. Many thanks for your contributions to the TRUTH Toy Fund and the Tress-Barry Fund. OUSEL.—1. Strathmore issued capital is £37,620. Sungei Bahru, £67,250. Each has about 1,000 acres planted, and they are quoted at about the same price. 2. About 10 per cent., with a large increase in 1914. 3. A cheap share, in view of planting programme, and strong financial position. OMERITO.—1. Yes. 2. 500 acres tappable 1911-12. 3. On well-grown estates tapping usually commences in the fifth year.

PENRYN.—I have a poor opinion of the property. PATE-DE-FOIE-GRAS COLONEL.—Both dividends have been paid. PELICAN.—I agree as to the suggested sale. The other should earn a dividend in 1911. PISCES.—1. A poor property. You might hold for some recovery, but do not average. 2. I have no confidence either in the property or the management. Sell. 3. A sound company. You might average, as you suggest. PIFFER.—1 and 2. Sound holdings. 3. Tremelbye, United Serdang.

QUERIST.—Strathmore is a non-speculative share quoted at a low price, and good for capital appreciation. The company is well-managed, and owns 1,000 acres of planted rubber. The acreage valuation is very low.

RURAL.—1 and 2. Average now. 3. There will not be much development before next year, and I should not average just at present. RESI.—You would probably do better in the end by exchanging. Write to me again when they reach 50s. 2. Exchange these for Tremelbye and United Serdang. 3. Hold for a substantial improvement. RHODESIAN.—The directors of the companies are respectable, but planting in new districts is necessarily experimental, and involves greater risk than in Malaya. Your list is a good one. I should select Nos. 15, 2, and 5 for present purchase.

SENEX.—1. Worth holding. 2. Over-capitalised, and I have no confidence in the estimates. An effort is being made to put the shares to a higher level. Sell at first favourable opportunity. STOURTON.—All sound, but for present purchase I prefer Tremelbye, Strathmore, and United Serdang. SURVEYOR.—Three sound holdings. SOLENT.—Labour difficulties have prevented realisation of 1910 estimate, but I believe the property is a good one. Hold your shares, and await the issue of the directors' circular. SECURE.—Thanks for interesting letter. You were quite right as to Strathmore, and your valuation of the other shares would hold good if there were no option certificates outstanding. The balance-sheet disclosed a surplus of £10,000, which divided among, say, 100,000 shares and option certificates would justify a premium of 2s. per share. SILVIUS.—The estimated return on Nos. 1 and 2 is over 12 per cent. They are not over-valued, but as you reside abroad make the exchange now. Tremelbye and United Serdang should in the end give you better results. I do not like No. 3. SYSTON.—Six inquiries but no coupon! See my Rules. SANDY.—See Rules.

TAGETA.—1 A reasonable lock-up. May earn a small dividend from tapioca next year. 2.—Merlimau is quite good. TAP.—1. Quoted daily in the Financier. 2. There is a reasonable prospect of their doing so. 3. Tapping has commenced.

ULSTER.—1. Hold Malacca and P.P.K. for steady recovery. The position is improving. Write again as to Crudes after the demonstration to shareholders. 2. The other is in good hands, but is developing slowly, and an exchange for Taiping would probably give quicker results. UNCERTAIN.—Vine and General Ten per Cent. preference shares have a first charge on the company's assets. The company has some good business in hand, and although the shares are speculative, I should not sell at present price.

VERITAS.—1. It is a very speculative holding, but well worth averaging at present price. 2. Should turn out well.

WINE.—The directors have no power to release you from payment of the call, but you might ask them to give you time if you require it. WOLF.—1. Yes. 2. A good dividend-payer, but I prefer Tremelbye. 3. A poor concern. W. M. L.—1. Officially quoted in Edinburgh, and I heard recently of dealings at over £4. 2. A sound holding. See last week's full reply to "Culling." W. HERBERT.—Worth holding in hope of some eventual recovery, but I do not recommend a further purchase. WYE.—Exchange No. 1 for Strathmore. No. 6 is poor. Sell on any recovery. Hold the others.

YEVOT.—Both good holdings, which should share in any market revival. YENDYS.—Hold Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4. As to No. 5, see second reply to "Ulster." 6. Merlimau, Taiping, Ceylon Timber and Rubber.

ZOO.—1. It will not affect the company. 2. Crudes. 3. I have a good opinion. ZIONIDE.—1. See reply to "Solent." 2, 3 and 5. Sound holdings for gradual appreciation. 4 and 6. More speculative, but promising. 7. Average as you suggest.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AZTEC.—a and b. Both appear sound industrial holdings. c. A very poor investment. I am unable to forecast a recovery. A. D. S.—The stock would make an excellent investment. ARBIPHLOGISTINE.—No. 2 appears a fair gamble. I do not regard the others as attractive purchases, and am unable to predict a market revival just at present. ACE.—It is devised in the interests of the bucket shops, whose own gains are made out of the losses of their customers. I have no space to explain its working in detail here, but in practice the customer, as a rule, comes off badly. Of course, there is hardly ever any real purchase to justify the charge for interest, the transaction being a mere book-keeping entry. ATLANTIC.—Sorry, but I have been unable to trace the concern in the ordinary reference channels, and am therefore unable to advise.

BACHELOR.—Necessarily very speculative, but at the present price the shares might be held and developments awaited. BULLWOOD (Dunoon).—A palpable flat-trap. See note in another column. BOX.—No doubt you have now heard that the arrangement in question is cancelled. See article under "Insurance."

CONIMO.—1. Yes, in such event you would forfeit your interest in the company. 2. You are entitled to call at the company's office and inspect the list of shareholders on payment of the statutory fee of 1s. CATHOLICUS.—1. Recent developments sound well, but the financial methods so far employed do not inspire me with confidence, and I do not care to advise a purchase. 2. Ordinarily it would be one penny, but for an exceptionally heavy number it may be three-halfpence. CAPTAIN.—1. As you may have to sell before the end of the year I see no reason to advise delay in doing so. 2. Sell. CREDULOUS.—The lottery is genuine, but the ticket touts who call themselves "bankers" are often unprincipled tricksters, and, of course, if you are cheated you will have no means of redress.

DOLL.—A broker is entitled to charge the same for a valuation as for buying and selling. As the commission in this case works out at less than ⅛ per cent., it cannot be called excessive. DUBLIN.—Keep them as a gamble for a recovery in market conditions.

ESSA.—You can do nothing now, except await the outcome of the liquidation. E. C. J.—Probably you will get a small amount back if you threaten them with an action. Let me know what happens.

HURRICANE.—Both sound, but I prefer No. 1. H. M. C.—1. The liability would be confined to the buyer; I am assuming you do not refer to Bank shares, which are under a special Act. 2. Shares on which there was an overdue call would not be good delivery.

IRELAND.—Keep them for an improvement in market conditions.

J. S. V. BICKFORD.—For reasons explained in many articles—the last being published on November 2—I do not recommend it.

KILKENNY. 1. Sell them. Prospects very poor. 2. A good commercial investment. 3. Metropolitan Electric Trams Five per Cent. Preference, United Alkali Ordinary, and Holborn and Frascati Five per Cent. Preference.

LOKU BANDA.—The price was correct; the financial position is not good enough at present to justify a higher figure. L. E. B.—In more than one recent case McKinley, Alexander and Sons have successfully pleaded the Gaming Act, so that I fear it would be useless for you to sue them. LANARK.—It is published in the interests of an outside firm, and is, of course, used to puff shares which they are interested in selling.

MARK.—They might turn out all right, but for the present the shares must be regarded as a gamble. The financial methods employed so far have not been conducive to confidence.

NET.—Carlton Hotel Preference, United Alkali Ordinary, and Metropolitan Electric Trams Five per Cent. Preference. 2. They ought to be worth holding.

NO ICET.—1. Present price about £5. In the circumstances, get your local banker to do the business. 2. Sound enough, but I should prefer an institution that confines itself to banking.

PUCK.—1. I can hardly be expected to vouch for the liability of a paper which I do not control. 2. They are outside brokers. I recommend you to deal through members of the Stock Exchange.

QUERCUS.—1. There is not enough to go upon yet to form a definite opinion, but you might hold, and await the issue of the next report. 2. The concern did not apparently issue a prospectus to the general public, and without the necessary details it is impossible for me to advise.

RESOLVE.—I do not recommend any outside broker. Do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange.

SEAN.—They are at present only a gamble, but the company is under good management, and the prospectus statements looked reasonable. SCOTSBOROUGH.—I regret I am unable to give you any information as to the concern named.

TIBIA.—The company is a sound concern, and I should keep the shares as an investment. TALBOT.—I do not care for the shares, and would get rid of them. As regards your other questions, see Rule 2.

W. B. (Aberlady).—The rubber and the mining shares are bucket shop rubbish. The Paris circulariser is a sharp who makes money at the expense of flats. WATCHFUL.—Of course, they are not members of the Stock Exchange, but outsiders. Members are not permitted to circularise strangers.

INSURANCE.

LAW CAR AND GENERAL—OFFER FROM NATIONAL PROVINCIAL WITHDRAWN—SERIOUS POSITION FOR THE SHAREHOLDERS.

IT is time that attention was called to the affairs of the Law Car and General Insurance Corporation. The company was founded so recently as 1906, and has a subscribed capital of about £290,000, of which £125,000 is paid up, and £165,000 is a liability for which some of the shareholders are responsible. Some of the shares are paid up in full, while on other £1 shares there remains a liability of 15s., 17s. 6d., and 19s. respectively.

The shareholders recently received a circular from the directors recommending the acceptance of an offer from the National Provincial Insurance Corporation. This latter company offered to buy Law Car shares, and to give its own paid up shares in exchange, but the National Provincial has wisely withdrawn its offer, upon which otherwise I should have some comments to make.

When an insurance company has got itself into difficulties, I am always anxious to help it out of them if it is possible for me to do so, or to contribute to that end. This is my feeling towards the Law Car and General, for the shareholders in which I am sincerely sorry. Some of them so recently as last March paid 30s. apiece for £1 shares, and must now recognise that at any rate the bulk of their money has been lost. The situation is, in fact, extremely serious, and I propose to explain the position to the best of my ability. The latest accounts which I have are dated September 30, 1909, the accounts up to last September not being published. The position is very materially worse than it was at the date of the last account. Three annual reports have been issued altogether, and from these it is apparent that the dividends which were declared had not in fact been earned, though the directors thought they had. In the share prospectus of last February it was stated, correctly, that dividends of 5, 10, and 12½ per cent. had been paid for the years 1907, 1908, and 1909 respectively; doubtless this statement encouraged investors to subscribe for £1 shares at 30s. There was an apparent profit, not a real profit, because the outstanding liabilities were under-estimated, and inadequate provision was made for unexpired risks.

It is next necessary to call attention to what I regard as an extremely serious matter. The financial position of the Law Car was not so manifestly strong as to secure insurances for large amounts, and the directors took the unwise and improper step of pledging certain of their securities to some of their insured. Policyholders in the Law Car would naturally suppose that the whole of the assets were available as security for the general body of the insured; this was not the case. It is enough to state this fact, without making any further comment upon it.

The real crux of the situation is the question of the amount of the liabilities and assets of the company at the present time. By liabilities I mean the amount of the outstanding claims, the amount due to various creditors, and the cost of carrying until they expire the risks for which premiums have been paid. Are the assets of the company, apart from the uncalled capital, sufficient to meet these liabilities? This is a point upon which the directors ought to give their shareholders the fullest information with the least possible delay. I am greatly afraid that experience will show that it will take the greater part, if not the whole, of the uncalled capital, in addition to the other assets, to liquidate these liabilities. If this be so it means that the entire share capital of something like £290,000 has been lost in the course of four years. In addition to this sum there is the premium paid on shares.

The Law Car has built up a certain amount of premium income, part of which could have been handed over to some other company for a substantial consideration, which would have minimised the loss to the shareholders; but I am sadly afraid that the directors have drifted and dallied too long, and that the asset of goodwill, which had some value six months or a year ago, is worth comparatively little at the present time.

The offer which was made by the National Provincial was not particularly attractive, and the fact that this offer was withdrawn has further deteriorated the value of such connections as the company has to sell.

The record of the Law Car is a significant illustration of what I have repeatedly said about the folly, nine times out of ten, of starting new insurance companies, and of well-intentioned people, who are entirely ignorant in regard to insurance matters, investing in, or becoming directors of, such companies. The directors of the Law Car meant well; they were under the impression that they had a good business, that they were making profits, and that they had earned the dividends which they paid. When they issued their unfortunate share prospectus last February they probably thought that their £1 shares were really worth 30s. Then difficulties began to crowd upon them thick and fast, and they were entirely incapable of dealing with the situation. It required decisive action, based upon adequate knowledge, and neither was available. It is clear now that the share prospectus had better not have been issued. It is probable that last June, and possible that last month, the situation could have been saved, at least to some extent. The board lacked courage; they drifted from one mistake into another, until now the situation is obviously desperate.

Will they not be courageous and decisive at last? Let them call their shareholders together and tell them unreservedly the full facts of the situation. The directors are responsible for £290,000 and more, when regard is paid to the premium on shares, of shareholders' money. They have lost much of it, perhaps all of it, and they should give an account of their stewardship.

The lesson of the Law Car should not be wasted. In particular, it should be remembered that nothing is easier than for the directors of a new insurance company to show a profit, and, if its management is incompetent or inexperienced, to think quite sincerely that a profit has been made. If its liabilities for outstanding claims are under-estimated, and if inadequate provision is set aside for unexpired risks, a profit is shown which is entirely fictitious. Incompetent management underestimates liabilities The 40 per cent. of the premium income, which is sufficient provision for unexpired risks in the case of old-established companies with a practically stationary income, is altogether too little for a new office with a rapidly increasing premium income.

FOR INSURANCE ANNOUNCEMENTS, see page 1331.

Incompetent managers and ignorant directors do not recognise these elementary truths, and shareholders become aware of them too late to prevent the loss of their money.

Don't! Don't! And again don't! become a shareholder in, or director of, a new insurance company, at least of any ordinary kind. It really requires such an infinitesimal modicum of common sense to see the supreme difficulties in the way of success. The average trading profit of strong, well-established companies does not amount to more than £7 10s. out of every £100 received in premiums. In order to establish a business a new company must pay higher rates of commission, and incur heavy expenditure of various kinds. In order to attract policyholders to an office that is comparatively unknown and not manifestly secure it must give some inducement in the form of reduced premiums. The margin of profit above normal expenditure and normal rates of premium does not allow for these concessions.

Then the new companies enter into re-insurance treaties with other offices at home or abroad; why should an established company make re-insurance arrangements with a more or less weak office that has no re-insurance business to offer in exchange, unless the new company grants exceptionally favourable terms or is ready to accept inferior risks?

Again, the best and most capable men are sure of good appointments with first-class offices who can afford to pay them well. The new concerns, whose future is doubtful, must put up with the services of inferior men who are confronted with a task of the greatest difficulty.

Sometimes the managers who form new companies make their own terms on a commission basis of a preposterous character; they are to be paid a commission on the premium income, perhaps subject to the condition that a dividend on the shares is to be paid. It is to their interests to make the premium income as big as possible, and it is to their interests to have a dividend declared. It is easy to show a dividend by underestimating liabilities in the way that I have described.

A further argument is used by the promoters of new insurance companies; they say that if they build up a certain amount of premium income, and then get into difficulties, they can sell their business to some other company; this has been done so often that the game is pretty well played out. The good companies will not buy, and the bad companies cannot pay, except in their own shares.

The fact is, the starting of new insurance offices has been hopelessly overdone. Rightly considered they are bad for policy-holders, and extremely well calculated to involve the shareholders in loss and the directors in serious difficulties.

Answers to Correspondents.

[Inquiries on the subject of insurance are answered in this column every week. Every letter containing an inquiry must be accompanied by a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.]

Mountjoy.—I had an article on the subject on November 2 to which I would refer you. Rong.—The Century is good for both purposes, especially the first. Rubber.—The Company is respectable and may possibly do well. You would, however, do far better with the United Kingdom Temperance, the Scottish Amicable, or the Prudential. Kilkenny.—The choice you have made is one of the best possible, and you could scarcely do better than take a second policy in the same office. If, however, you want to make a change you had better write again telling me what kind of assurance you require, and what your age is. Midlothian.—1. On the whole, and especially in view of your last-mentioned requirements, the Mutual Life of New York is best. 2. The office you mention is a very fine one. I am afraid their present rate of bonus is hardly likely to be maintained, though it is certain to be very good. Oxeye.—There is certainly no sounder office, and its terms for annuities are good, though not quite the best. Gibbie.—The company may be safe, but I cannot recommend it. Suspicious.—I am not sure whether the company is, or is not, still in existence. In any case it is better avoided. I am not familiar with the French policies you mention. Tell me their nature and I will reply. Jantsbery.—1. For your purpose the Australian Mutual Provident is the best of the three, and the National Provident next. 2. Either would be better then this office, which, however, is perfectly sound. (3) Both classes are excellent and quite safe, and must be compared on their merits for individual cases. (4) Since in your circumstances liberal surrender values may be of great importance, combined with good bonus results, you should obtain particulars from the Mutual Life of New York. You can compare twenty-year policies in various companies by taking age thirty-five maturing at fifty-five in all cases. Possibly the "Bachelor Policy" of the Legal and General might suit you. Tyronian.—You cannot effect the assurance you want without the consent of the person to be assured. Nib.—The Law Union and Rock is very excellent indeed for the policy you want. Ealing.—All three companies are so absolutely sound and safe that all you need consider is which gives the best terms. Oakbank.—I should advise you to sell on the best terms you can get at present, or in the near future. Rechab.—The company is quite sound and good, and for the particular policy you ask about is distinctly the best. Garryowen.—I should advise you not to effect your insurance in the office you mention. See my article of November 2. Highlow.—Pay no more. See my article of November 2. A. C. K.—Repeat enquiry accompanied by your name and address. Bloye.—I think you had much better lose the money you have paid than have anything more to do with either company. D. O. N. E.—(1) Send me the circular from the committee. (2) I doubt if individual policy holders will get notice, especially those who have wisely lapsed their policies. (3) I do no know.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

SANTA GERTRUDIS SOUTH.

The statutory general meeting of the members of Santa Gertrudis South, Limited, was held on Saturday, the 19th inst., at the offices of the company, 3, Lombard Street, E.C.

Mr. William J. Smyth, M.D., who presided, said early in the present year the Pachuca district came into great prominence, and, acting on important information from such a reliable source as Mr. M. H. Burnham, M.A.I.M.M., this syndicate was organised. The property they had been fortunate in securing represents seventy-two claims, amounting in all to 175 acres, more or less, to the immediate south of and abutting on the El Refugio and Santa Gertrudis properties, belonging to the Camp Bird Company.

Mr. Burnham pointed out that the mines secured for the syndicate were parallel to the strike of the Santa Gertrudis vein, and also contiguous to the famous El Refugio vein (which was also parallel to one of the boundaries of their property), and from his personal knowledge of the dip of these two veins he was able to state that this company's holdings contained the deeper levels of both of those ore bodies. To the west they had the various working groups comprising the Real del Monte Mines, in which were found the famous Hidalgo, Corteza, Dos Carlos, and El Lobo veins. Mr. Burnham showed that it was practically a certainty that three of these veins—viz., Hidalgo, Corteza, and Dos Carlos—would enter in and cross their property in a north-west to south-easterly direction.

At the period when this report was written, the statement, although leaving little doubt as to its truth, was not then actually proved. The work, however, which had since been done in opening up and proving the position of the veins on this property had been of such a satisfactory nature as to actually have encountered on their property the definite existence of the anticipated famous ore formations; and the directors had definite statements from their engineer that the Hidalgo, Corteza, and El Lobo veins had been opened up on their property, the first being about 9 ft., the second 8 ft., and the third 6 ft. in width, all carrying values in gold and silver of great promise.

Reports and statements received from the resident engineer informed them that they had struck one of these veins, of which they were advised by cablegram in July last. A later cable also gave them the news that three of the veins had then been uncovered carrying both gold and silver values. Since the receipt of these cables, active work had been done in sinking shafts, driving, etc., to carry the proof to a further stage.

BELINGWE GOLD REEFS, LIMITED.

An extraordinary general meeting of the Belingwe Gold Reefs, Limited, was held on November 17 at the Institute of Chartered Accountants, Moorgate Place, E.C., for the purpose of considering a resolution to increase the capital of the company to £200,000 by the creation of a further 50,000 shares of £1 each. Mr. Alfred E. Ann (the chairman of the company) presided.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the resolution, said: I consider it unnecessary to give you any particulars as to the working of the company, because we shall be having our general meeting very shortly. But I think you will be glad to know that, in the arrangement which is proposed to be made, we are not taking any cash from the company; we are asking you to increase the capital of the company by a further £50,000, with the object of acquiring properties which we believe have very great merits. The properties we have had placed before us, which we have duly considered, have been inspected by our own engineer, and he reports most favourably upon them; in fact, I may say in respect of one or two of the properties that the company can immediately commence work, as the ore is at the surface, and the reefs exposed show that they can be made profitable from the very commencement of work. The properties which we already possess are no doubt of very great value, but their successful working rests entirely on the fact of whether we have sufficient money to work with. The arrangement we have made, which we feel certain is for the benefit of the shareholders, will provide us with funds which will not only enable us to work the properties we propose to acquire, but give a speedy return, and in that way to take advantage of the properties we already possess, one of which is of phenomenal richness. We have another property which is more than a mile in length, but it will be some time before it reaches its producing stage. The engineer, who has inspected the new properties, returns to Rhodesia, I think, in about a fortnight, so that we will get to work almost immediately. The improved position of this company will, I am convinced, enable us to become one of the most successful companies in Rhodesia.

The Hon. H. A. Stanhope seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

QUEER STORY.

THE UNDERSTUDY.

"IF it comes to pathos," intercepted the Very Clean Shaven Man with the slightly abnormal hair, "I can give you an instance which is somewhat unique. May I?"

The Literary Light who had introduced the subject with the commendable view of amassing copy for his next article, became on the instant all ears.

"Please do," murmured an Unconsidered Unit from the rear; and the Very Clean Shaven Man, whose voice was deep and full of thrilling and melodious tones, began thereupon.

"The hero of my story," he said, "was an actor with aspirations; the heroine was an actress without them. Inevitably the man rose, while the woman remained stationary. But before their ways parted they had once played together in a tragedy—played as lovers. It happened that illness gave the woman her chance—she was the understudy for the leading lady's part in this special melodrama. In the third act the hero, throwing all discretion to the winds, makes a passionate declaration of love to the heroine, who is socially far beneath him.

"'Let them do their worst!' he says, with her hands in his—'let them say their most! So long as seas fret and worlds swing on through space, I love you—I love you—I love you!'

"He said much more, of course, but these words were the climax, so to speak, and midway through them, when he had drawn the Understudy quite close to himself and was looking deep into her eyes, he suddenly, and greatly to his own amazement, read there a message so passionate and eternal, that for a moment the auditorium swam out in mist, and the stage rocked like a gale-oppressed steamer. The eyes of the Understudy told him that this was no make-believe to her, but Heaven's sober ecstatic truth—that she had worshipped the actor in silence for years—that she would never cease to worship him whilst a heart beat in her body. . . . All this the actor read, gentlemen, and much more, just as a drowning man reads the history of his life in a few gulping instants."

The Very Clean Shaven Man made an impressive pause.

Into the pool of silence which followed, a Thoughtful Person in tweeds dropped staccato surmises as they might have been pebbles.

"That would have one of two possible effects on his performance," he said. "He might be stupefied and lose his nerve. He might be inspired. It's all according to disposition."

The Very Clean Shaven Man smiled, showing teeth that were beyond all criticism. "You are right, sir," he said. "This actor hovered for the fraction of an ominous second between the two extremes, then the last extreme triumphed. He rose to a height he had never even viewed from the jealous distance before. In fact, that particular speech made him. The critics made much of it in the next day's papers. It was belauded to the skies, but the critics agreed that the Understudy's work had been commonplace and unsatisfying. And afterwards the actor received an immediate engagement in America, and played in many pieces, and skimmed up the ladder three rungs at a time."

"And the woman?" asked the Unconsidered Unit a little sternly.

"He only saw her again—once. She was nothing to him, you see. He had a wife whom he loved devotedly. No, she was nothing to him. She had just acted as a passing inspiration. And yet the manner of their next meeting constitutes the pathos of which I spoke."

The Literary Light leant forward and quivered with attention; the Thoughtful Person in tweeds gave an anticipatory sigh.

"Ten years later the actor happened to be investigating a particularly sad case which had come before a dramatic benevolent society with which he was connected. Having a little time on his hands, he went himself to the mean street in which the case (she was a woman, poor soul!) existed. He carried food with him, for report said that she and starvation were rubbing shoulders. A frowsy landlady admitted him, shaking her head.

"She don't let no one in. She don't never go out. There's some man always in there a-making love to her. It's my opinion——'

"But the actor did not wait for her opinion. He walked up the wretched stairs and paused on the third landing. He paused, gentlemen, because he feared that his senses were forsaking him, and that he had become suddenly subject to startling hallucinations. Coming from the room he distinctly heard his own voice—his own voice impassioned, pleading—using the words he had so often used in the play which had made his fortune. The words fell one by one upon the murky silence.

"'Let them do their worst; let them say their most! So long as seas fret and worlds swing on through space, I love you—I love you—I love you.'

"The actor's breath came in gasps. He could stand no more; the whole uncanny thing made him feel sick and giddy. He had but one impulse—to solve the mystery. Without knocking, he burst open the door, and then he saw a very curious sight."

The Very Clean Shaven Man let his hands (they were white and well-formed) drop on either arm of his chair—his eyes were introspective.

"He saw the large red outline of a giant gramophone, which went on declaiming the rest of the speech with unabated fervour, and across the table on which the gramophone stood, like a martyred devotee before a shrine, he saw a woman—dead. Her arms were across the table, her stiff lips smiling. She must have fallen as she fixed in the record, and, though her face was greatly changed, he had seen it before—on a night years ago, when its eyes had told him secrets."

The Literary Light fidgeted.

"Would not that be more in the nature of tragedy?" he asked. "Pathos is altogether a gentler and more refined thing. Death is so ——"

But the Very Clean Shaven Man interrupted him.

"The actor found out afterwards," he said, "that this woman had slaved her fingers to the bone—had given her last farthing for this toy with its memory-provoking record. She had gone without food to procure it. She had died happy because of its grotesque presence. In these days of lightly come and lightly go, it seems to me ——"

"You are right," broke in the Unconsidered Unit, suddenly. "The sublime and the ridiculous came into close proximity, yet she made the ridiculous sublime. That is a truly pathetic achievement."

"Well, the actor ought to have given her no end of a funeral," grumbled a morbid youth, who mistook a bad digestion for temperament.

"He did," said the Very Clean Shaven Man.

Then the Very Clean Shaven Man resumed a fur-lined overcoat and walked away with the short, graceful, characteristic strides of one who is accustomed to traverse constricted spaces.

BOOKS.

IT is odd to find Sheridan's

"You write with ease to show your breeding,
But easy writing's curst hard reading" attributed, in Messrs. Griffin and Minchin's "Life of Robert Browning," (1) to Byron. It is applied by Alfred Domett (Waring) to the poet's "Red Cotton Nightcap Country," written in seven weeks; but some of the poet's easiest writing is also the easiest reading, while "Sordello" took years to compose. Browning's obscurity is due, not to "easy writing," but to hard thinking, to excessive condensation of style, and to the poet's delight in the dramatic presentation of his subjects. Browning has a lawyer's love of "putting a case" and a lawyer's skill in presenting it plausibly from any side, as, e.g., in "The Ring and the Book," and this delight and skill in dramatisation run riot also in other poems—e.g., in "Hohenstiel" and "Fifine at the Fair," where the reader, being unprepared for it, is, therefore, perplexed by it. Browning would probably have been more successful as a dramatist if his dialogue had not so often been terse, pregnant, and epigrammatic to obscurity. The success of "Strafford," so far as it was a success, was greatly due to the popularity of the moment of Macready; while the failure of "A Blot on the 'Scutcheon" so far as it was a failure, was due only in part to the hostility of Macready, who took as much pains to have it damned as other managers would have taken to ensure its triumph. Perhaps Forster had more to do with the unhappy fate of "A Blot on the 'Scutcheon" than either its own dramatic demerits or Macready's huffiness and spitefulness. Dickens, to whose consideration Forster had submitted the play, wound up an almost delirious letter of enthusiastic appreciation with: "If you tell Browning that I have seen it, tell him that I believe from my soul there is no man living (and not many dead) who could produce such a work." As Forster did not pass on this appreciation to Browning (who, indeed, saw the letter only thirty years later, when it appeared in the "Life of Dickens"), it is more than probable that he strongly advised Macready against the production of the play. Indeed, Forster came out into the open in an "Examiner" review of "Colombe's Birthday," which closed with the verdict: "As far as Mr. Browning has gone, we abominate his tastes as much as we respect his genius." This review scotched the friendship between the poet and his critic, which, however, was not killed till years later, at a dinner-party, when a discussion between the two went near to bringing Forster to an end like that of Abner Dean of Angel's, when "the subsequent proceedings interested him no more!"

On Browning's return to England the intimacy between the two men was renewed, and it became the custom of the poet to lunch with Forster on most Sundays. But he grew restive under Forster's patronising airs. At a dinner party at the Benzons the two men began, in the words of an eye-witness, "to nag at one another." On Browning citing in support of some story he had told the authority of a lady of his acquaintance, and on Forster expressing a doubt of her veracity, the poet, in a sudden rage, seized a decanter and threatened to throw it at his head if he said another word. Before Forster could recover from his astonishment friends intervened, and the situation was saved.

"Tantane animis cœlestibus iræ!" But Browning, as this interesting biography amply testifies, had all the generosity that often goes with irascibility. Tried even by the test of literary jealousy—a crucial test for all "fools to fame"—he was magnanimous. He never wavered in his conviction of Tennyson's superiority, which he expressed when they met by bending low and addressing the laureate as "Magister meus!" By the way, when one remembers that not the least of the contrasts between the two poets lay in the tunefulness of their verse—Tennyson's being the most and Browning's the least melodious in our literature—it is surprising to learn that Browning was a consummate musician, while Tennyson knew and cared little for music.

In reading Mrs. Sharp's fascinating memoir of "William Sharp (Fiona Macleod)" (2) I was reminded of an early ambition of Browning's "to assume and realise I know not how many different characters, and the world was never to guess that the respective authors of this poem, the other novel, such an opera, such a speech, etc., etc., were no other than one and the same individual." But Browning, with all his dramatic faculty, could never have personated two authors so distinct in thought and style as William Sharp and "Fiona Macleod." But was it conscious personation in the case of William Sharp? Writing on his death-bed he says, "You will think I have wholly deceived you about Fiona Macleod. But in an intimate sense this is not so; though (and inevitably) in certain details I have misled you. Only it is a mystery. I cannot explain. Perhaps you will intuitively understand, or may come to understand. 'The rest is silence.' Farewell." And Mr. W. B. Yeats, who knew Sharp intimately, said in a lecture to the Aberdeen Centre of the Franco-Scottish Society in 1907:—"William Sharp was the most extraordinary psychic I have ever encountered. I really believe that 'Fiona Macleod' was a secondary personality—as distinct a second personality as those one reads about in books of psychical research. At times Sharp was really to all intents and purposes a different being." And the Irish poet is obviously of the opinion that the Scotch poet was what Shakespeare says of a rival "by spirits taught to write above his mortal pitch." Certainly as writers we seem to have two distinct personalities to deal with in William Sharp and "Fiona Macleod," differing as much from each other as talent differs from genius. On the other hand, Grant Allen had a shrewd suspicion from the first of the identity of William Sharp and "Fiona Macleod," divining "Fiona" to be the feminine side of his friend. And here, rather than in any theory of dual psychic personality, you probably have the explanation of the difference between William Sharp and "Fiona Macleod." Matthew Arnold somewhere notes the affinity between the Celtic and the feminine nature. He says—and he might have been speaking of Sharp's "Fiona" personality—that the sensibility of the Celtic nature, its nervous exaltation, have something feminine in them, and that the chivalry of the Celt is due to his affinity with the feminine idiosyncrasy, that he is not far from its secret.

I find in Mr. Aylmer Maude's "Life of Tolstoi: Later Years" (3) that Tourgenef on his death-bed wrote to adjure him with his last breath to take up again the pen of the novelist and so regain his lost throne. I fancy, however, that Tolstoy had but vacated a lower throne for a higher, from which, as an apostle, he has influenced the world more widely and more profoundly than he ever did as a novelist. On the other hand, this most interesting book confirms me in my impression that Tolstoy's apostolic influence is not of the kind at which he aimed. It is negative rather than positive, rather destructive than creative. What Tolstoy has chiefly done in recent years is to force the world to realise the unbridgeable breadth and depth of the gulf between the Christianity of the Churches and the Christianity of Christ. He forces you, in fact, to realise that if Christ came again to earth He would have His work—and that the very same work—to do all over again. I need not say that Mr. Aylmer Maude's intimate revelations of the life of Tolstoy, the apostle, are extraordinarily interesting, if now and then they are a little disillusioning.

The most interesting and not the least accurate of all the works which have appeared of late of a semi-historical character is certainly Miss Marie Hay's "The Winter Queen: Being the Unhappy History of Elizabeth Stuart, Queen of Bohemia" (4). Without any distortion, suppression, or violation of history, Miss Hay has made an exciting romance out of her mass of material. It is true that the story of this daughter of the ill-fated House of Stuart was itself romantic; but it needed something of the magic skill of a Scott to make it seem at once as real and as thrilling as Miss Hay has done in this admirably staged and managed historical piece.

Miss Braddon's right hand has rather gained than lost in cunning in the fifty years of practice. She was always an admirable story-teller, and her skill in that art carries you lightly and swiftly through "Beyond These Voices" (5) in spite of your lack of sympathy with its somewhat flabby heroine and her two unsatisfactory husbands. The murder of her first husband by her second is not, perhaps, so mysterious as her finding it a mystery. However, as I say, Miss Braddon's narrative power carries you through at a rate too brisk for carping criticism to overtake your enjoyment.

Nothing will persuade me that a man ever wrote "The Getting of Wisdom" (6), by "Henry Handel Richardson." It is the most convincing picture of an Australian girls' school; or, for that matter, of any second-rate girls' school anywhere, that ever was painted. The girls are far from being refined or even "nice," but they are as human as their odious governesses would allow them to be. Indeed, since, as Swift says, "nice persons are persons with nasty ideas," the very prudishness of the governesses had much to do with the pruriency of their pupils.

Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. have now commenced the publication of the new Centenary Biographical Edition of the Works of Thackeray by the issue of "Vanity Fair" as the first two volumes (price 6s. each). Thackeray, as is well-known, did not wish to be the subject of a biography, but while respecting this wish, his daughter, Lady Ritchie, some years ago wrote a series of introductions to his works containing many interesting notes and memories, chiefly concerned with his literary work, together with selections from his correspondence. For the present edition Lady Ritchie has rearranged and extended these biographical prefaces by including many new letters. It has also been decided to print some of the novelist's hitherto unknown writings which are of sufficient interest to justify this course, but Lady Ritchie quite rightly deprecates any reproduction of the mass of anonymous hackwork (as she terms it) which her father did for the newspapers and magazines. A special feature of the edition will be its wealth of illustrations, comprising about 500 separate plates in addition to numerous illustrations in the text. For frontispiece each of the twenty-six volumes will have a different portrait of Thackeray, the portraits being arranged in chronological order, beginning with one in which he appears at the age of three years. The volumes are handsomely produced, and in every respect this Centenary Edition will appeal to admirers of Thackeray as the most desirable and attractive of all the editions of his works.

Of Dickens's works a Centenary Edition, in which all the original illustrations are excellently reproduced is in course of publication by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. "Nicholas Nickleby," in two volumes, with thirty-nine illustrations by Phiz, and a portrait of the author by Daniel Maclise, and "A Child's History of England," with eight illustrations by Marcus Stone and J. Mahony, have just been issued. The Centenary Dickens, which is to be completed in thirty-six volumes, price 3s. 6d. each, will form a handsome library edition.

In a review in last week's TRUTH of Colonel Roosevelt's "African Game Trails" reference was made to his crushing refutation of Mr. Thayer's too sweeping assertion "that all patterns and colours whatsoever of all animals that prey or are preyed on are under normal circumstances obliterative." It is noteworthy that the same contention is disposed of in another most interesting sporting book, Major R. L. Kennion's "Sport and Life in the Further Himalaya," which has recently been published (price 12s. 6d.) by Messrs. Blackwood and Sons. "The summer pelage of the markhor," Major Kennion writes, "is of a yellowish white, making them almost as conspicuous in the distance as a flock of sheep; while in the winter the coats of the old bucks are of a dark iron-grey, looking in the snow almost black—a curious reversal of the usual seasonal protective colouring exhibited by other beasts and birds that live much in the snow." Major Kennion shows no less zest and zeal in his pursuit of these mountain sheep and goats than Colonel Roosevelt in his hunting down lions and elephants, for, after all, it is the chase and not the kill which matters most—

> All things that are
> Are with more spirit chased than enjoyed.

And it is the excitement of the chase of a long-horned goat or sheep with horns an inch or two above the average in length which the major enjoyed and makes you enjoy in this pleasant book.

Mr. Trowbridge puts himself somewhat unnecessarily about in his study of Cagliostro (Chapman and Hall, 16s. net). Nor does his change of view of his hero from an arch-impostor to an arch-imposed quite compensate for his somewhat diffuse account of him. The chief interest of Cagliostro for the reading public is first his similarity with some of the charlatans of to-day, and second his connection with the affair of the diamond necklace. Of this last, Mr. Trowbridge gives a stirring enough account. But while he takes pleasure in abusing the wicked editor of the Courrier de l'Europe, who sees in Cagliostro, the impostor, another and certainly worse impostor, Balsamo, he by no means convinces the reader that even supposing him to be himself, whoever that was, Cagliostro's quackeries are worthy of exoneration to the extent of three hundred pages. At best he appears a sort of mountebank imposing upon the ever-credulous in the guise of the Grand Cophta. After all we all have a living to make, and that seems to me a better excuse for Cagliostro than any that Mr. Trowbridge advances with such spirit.

To a new edition of 'Great and Greater Britain" (Smith, Elder and Co., 10s. 6d. net), Mr. J. Ellis Barker has added a couple of hundred pages expounding his views on the Irish question and Unionist land policy.

Messrs. Jack have now concluded the publication of the Era Shakespeare in forty-two cloth-bound pocket volumes (price, eightpence each), containing the poet's complete works, together with a biography and an index to the words, phrases, and allusions dealt with in the footnotes. For the general reader these explanatory footnotes are a valuable feature of the edition, and at the end of each play the editor, Dr. Hudson, has given further notes on matters of textual comment and criticism which will interest more serious students. Its distinctive merits should ensure a wide popularity for the Era Shakespeare.

Mr. Frederick Litchfield is engaged upon a new and revised edition of Chaffers' "Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain," which will be published by Messrs. Reeves and Turner. In order that the work may be made as complete as possible, Mr. Litchfield will be glad if manufacturers, collectors, and others in a position to assist by supplying information will communicate with him at 32, St. James's Street, S.W.

ART.

THE POST IMPRESSIONISTS.

SANITY goes by majorities. I conform to a number of conventions of a numerous community; you flout them; each thinks the other insane, but the majority carries the day. There are, however, a number of sane people who would dearly love to be thought insane if only for notoriety's sake. Hence such stories as that of the "Salon des Refusés," where some one is said to have tied a number of paint-brushes filled with different colours to a donkey's tail, and placed him back to the canvas, and sent the result to the Salon. Speculation centred round the latest art "tendenz," the right of the individual to a literal interpretation of himself, the telling effect of pure rhythm, the thrill of a really primitive appeal. The canvas became the "clou" of the exhibition.

The story is a little crude; it is even primitive or "synthetic," as the author of the preface to the catalogue of the Post Impressionists at the Grafton Galleries would doubtless have us say. But, then, the exhibits at the Grafton Galleries are synthetic, too—I have it on the best authority—particularly the colour schemes of MM. Cézanne, Gauguin, and Van Gogh. Being a sane person, they merely strike me as resembling the decorative effect that might result from a child's miscellaneous handling of his first paint-box, mitigated somewhat, perhaps, by the kindergarten movement; as possessing a certain savagery which make them at their best look like a painted German toy, at their worst like a brave in war-paint; some, again, as containing a certain beastliness, which, on the whole, needs no re-discovery. But at the Grafton Galleries, so recently the home of the commonplaces of the National Loan Exhibition, one feels apologetic for one's sanity. I have seen a few people laugh openly at the exhibition, usually adding, however, that they feared it was beyond them; I have heard others say, "Ye-es, isn't it?" hoping for inspiration from their own words, while young ladies with a Chelsea manner have openly expressed their opinion that the general public could not be expected to understand the high Gallic genius set before them.

On the whole, the exhibition has suffered from the sanity of its visitors. It was, in the first place, a mistake on the part of its promoters to engage the support of such eminently sane persons as the Director of the National Gallery, the Keeper of the Wallace Collection, the Keeper of the King's Pictures, the Director of the National Portrait Gallery. In the second place, these gentlemen were hardly playing the game in accepting the office of god-papa, knowing, as they must have known, that a sane, inartistic nation such as our own would interpret their action as inducing post-impressionism to show itself unguardedly in its true colours. Again, though the lure of a few scratch Manets has made a definite appeal to the above-mentioned young ladies with the Chelsea manner and to a few young gentlemen with large black ties and billycock hats, yet with the greater and less sophisticated—the sane public, in short—this exhibition of his experimentalism has not led them to understand the rest of the exhibition, but has rather caused them to tar Manet with the same brush. Finally, the Grafton Galleries, pleasant as they are for old fogies such as Rembrandt or Frans Hals, do not admit of the spaciousness which, in Paris, would allow the visitor to retire far enough to render invisible the first shock of primitive colour.

It is only fair to recognise the high aims of post-impressionism. Paul Gauguin's "Tahiti" paintings have the distinction of representing uncouthness at its best; his black Adam and Eve cheer us up by making us realise that there could have been no Fall in the Garden of Eden, since there was nothing to fall from. The same feature applies even in greater degree to the rest of the exhibitors, for M. Gauguin has not quite succeeded in convincing us of the primitiveness that can neither draw nor paint. M. Matisse shows most of all that primitiveness, consistently practised, would leave all to the imagination, thus dispensing with painters altogether, while M. Maurice Denis, throwing himself into a fine ecstasy of colour, departs from his usual sense of decoration to support his colleague in this economical endeavour. On the whole the exhibition may stand for an attempt to achieve the heart or more particularly the paintbrush of a child. But as M. Gauguin at least has learnt to draw, and as Manet is commonly known to have been responsible for some essentially sane work, the exhibition proves conclusively that if man does attempt to be born again, it is only second childhood that he succeeds in achieving. In a really primitive community, moreover—and it is of no use doing things by halves—M. Cézanne, M. Van Gogh, and M. Maurice Denis in his present phase, would certainly have been left behind to die.

* * * * * *

I have so frequently discussed the relative positions of art, so-called, and photography in these columns that it is unnecessary again to dwell upon the point in considering Mr. A. J. Anderson's "The Artistic Side of Photography" (Stanley Paul, 12s. 6d. net). Mr. Anderson's book has for the layman the interest of letting him into the secrets of camera hocus-pocus, which probably began for him when, in his early youth, he was disappointed of seeing fly out from under the black velvet the little birds promised him for sitting still; the initiated, on the other hand, will observe with approval Mr. Anderson's tendency to simplify, and as he himself puts it, "to serve up plain roast chicken instead of something modish à la Rostand." The book is well illustrated and contains some valuable hints. The introduction of the personal note in the form of Q. and A. with Monica, is perhaps unfortunate, since the lightening of a book sometimes causes it to lose some of its weight.

MUSIC.

THE announcement that Mr. Beecham and the Grand Opera Syndicate are joining forces is decidedly interesting, and many reasons suggest themselves why such an arrangement should prove quite a good one. If Mr. Beecham's independent efforts had been better one might have regretted the fusion. As it is, the public has given Mr. Beecham so little encouragement that it is difficult to see how he could have hoped to have continued his missionary efforts much longer. Even the most public-spirited capitalist cannot be expected to throw away thousands a year for an indefinite length of time. Under the circumstances it seems an excellent idea, therefore, for him to have come to terms with the Syndicate. They have the prestige and the connection, likewise the copyrights and the singers; Mr. Beecham, in his turn, has youth and energy, audacity and assurance. What more could be wanted? Covent Garden has been taxed before now with old-fogeyism. Mr. Beecham should make the dry bones live.

There are other considerations, too. Mr. Hammerstein is looming up on the horizon, and the existing occupants of the field may well deem it advisable to close their ranks against the common enemy. The outlook for that impresario cannot indeed be regarded as particularly rosy. It is difficult to see where he is going to get his audiences from unless he finds some altogether novel means of attracting the public. Mr. Beecham's experience has certainly been discouraging enough. He has done works of all schools in first-rate style, but the public have steadily stayed away. If the Kingsway opera house is not better supported Mr. Hammerstein will certainly not make his fortune by it.

Are we to hear "Salome" or not? According to the latest reports the opera is to be given, but with the names of the characters altered, and otherwise modified. This will be better than not having the work at all, but it is really outrageous that it should be necessary to resort to such shifts and expedients for the purpose of presenting in London a work which has long since been performed, as a matter of course, in every other civilised country in the world. Pinero was surely right when he said that England was the suburb of Europe. It is not even as if the old rule against presenting Biblical themes could any longer serve as an excuse for obscurantist officialism, for that plea went by the board when Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila" was licensed.

Meanwhile, "Elektra," which achieved such a sensational success less than a year ago, seems to have quickly exhausted its drawing power—as is sufficiently evident by the small number of performances which have been given of it during the current season. No one could have ever believed, however, that the rush to hear "Elektra" when it was first produced represented any real appreciation of such a difficult work by a public which still regards "Tristan" and the "Ring" as advanced and abstruse; it was merely a success of curiosity which the work achieved, and few of those who have once "put in" the work have any desire apparently to hear it again. It may be so with "Salome" as well, though it is generally agreed that this is much the finer opera of the two.

Many concerts have been given lately, but they will soon be coming to an end now, and this year the musical recess seems likely to begin even earlier than usual owing to the impending election. However, it is all to the good so far as concert-givers are concerned that it should have been decided to get the struggle over before Christmas, and having had a not very prosperous season so far, the profession must hope to recoup itself in the new year, when the Coronation may prove, perhaps, a favourable factor.

The "Parsifal" concert given by the Queen's Hall Choral Society last week was of some interest, but unfortunately the enjoyment of the performance for most was diminished by the lowering of the lights, putting singers up in the organ loft, and so on, to reproduce the Bayreuth "atmosphere." At the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert on Saturday Beethoven's first symphony was a "novelty" of some interest, and Miss Ellen Beck sang finely. At Bechstein Hall, on the same afternoon, Mr. Harold Bauer played magnificently. Another fine pianist heard earlier in the week was Señor Vianna da Motta. Two enjoyable vocal recitals were those of Fräulein Elena Gerhardt and Miss Maggie Teyte (the latter charming in a programme of modern French songs), while Mme. Kirkby Lunn sang very artistically also at the Broadwood concert, at which the clever Aranyi sisters were also heard.

An original revival of Handel's "L'Allegro" opened Miss Marie Brema's season at the Savoy. Opinions may differ as to the value of Handel's music, but no one can deny that the work is at least more entertaining when presented in this charming fashion, in the guise of a masque, than in the ordinary manner in the concert room. Perhaps Miss Brema will take in hand some of the oratorios now, and give them to us in the same fashion—the Censor permitting. "The Two Hunchbacks," which followed "L'Allegro," is a pretty little fairy play from the French of M. Emil Cammaerts, which was most daintily presented, while everyone knows by this time how beautifully Miss Brema and her clever company do Gluck's "Orpheus."

Mr. G. H. Clutsam has been writing in interesting fashion on the whole-tone scale in connection with the development of modern harmony, and in the course of his remarks he observes:—

> A simple treatment of musical ideas at this period of production is futile. A composer who undertakes to write simply and clearly, rhythmically, harmonically, and melodically is in an impossible position. It has all been done over and over again. Trivial themes, conventional construction and uninventional variations can no longer give interest to an educated listener to music. . . . Consequently there is little probability of any composer saying anything "new" in the strict sense of the word. He can only presume to say something differently.

If this means that everything has been said in music, and that the only resource of the modern composer is to say it over again in a different way, it surely goes too far. It is doubtless true that each generation has always believed this, but great composers have never been lacking so far to prove the utter fallacy of the idea; and for my own part I don't think they ever will be.

Musical News printed recently an interesting interview with Debussy, culled from an American paper. Debussy seems to have spoken freely, and to have said some arresting things. Asked how he composed, he replied, we are told:—

> Of course, in the first place, I must have a subject. Then I concentrate on that subject, as it were—no, not musically, in an ordinary way, just as anybody would think of a subject. Then gradually, after these thoughts simmered for a certain length of time, music begins to centre around these, and I feel that I must give expression to the harmonies which haunt me. And then I work unceasingly. But there are days and weeks, and often months, that no ideas come to me. No matter how much I try, I cannot produce work that I am satisfied with.

There is a moral here for that school of composers who hold with the late Anthony Trollope that the best source of inspiration is a piece of cobbler's wax attached to the seat of genius. But then some composers might wait a very long time indeed if they tarried till great ideas had come to them.

THE THEATRES.

"The Unwritten Law," at the Garrick.

MR. LAURENCE IRVING and Miss Mabel Hackney have returned to town, and I hope London will encourage them to remain a long while. If interesting acting and an interesting play count for anything this newest management should enjoy a successful season. Mr. Irving, who is author, actor, and manager all in one, has founded his play upon Dostoieffski's fine novel, "Crime and Punishment." This is to say that he has taken a few essential facts from the book, and out of these has built up a drama—melodramatic in style, but saved from being commonplace melodrama by the interesting idea which it contains. It is the story of a sympathetic murderer, one Raskolnikoff. His sympathies are aroused by the troubles of poor little Sonia Martinova, who is desperately endeavouring to keep herself and her little sister, but loses one post after another because her employers make reprehensible overtures to her. The climax comes when a brute called Gromoff, who manages the house in which Sonia, Raskolnikoff, and a number of other poor creatures lodge, threatens to turn the girl out into the streets unless she will listen to him. Gromoff is a scoundrel, and a bully and a beast. The girl is a little saint; yet if these two are left to fight out their own destinies the saint will inevitably go to the wall and vice will triumph. Accordingly, Raskolnikoff decides to intervene, and so he intervenes with an axe. Murder may be evil, but out of evil good shall come. Sonia shall be saved.

Out of this beginning two interesting psychological situations develop. The man and the woman begin to fall in love with one another. The man, however, is not a strong enough character to put his crime behind him and not allow it to haunt him, while the woman, though profoundly grateful to him for having saved her, cannot condone murder. The second psychological situation is that between Raskolnikoff and the examining magistrate, Bezak, who wishes to get him into his clutches. The murderer behaves in such a crazy and incriminating way at times that Bezak would be justified in arresting him at once, but his particular little hobby is making criminals confess their crimes. He is an artist in crime is Mr. Bezak, and he carefully works up for himself little dramatic entertainments in which the curtain falls on the confessions of his victims! This scene is really a great scene. The wily magistrate is admirably played by Mr. Dalziel Heron, while Mr. Irving gives a wonderfully vivid picture of the tortured man who is clinging to life because he is the only person who stands between poor little Sonia and destruction. I have seen examining magistrates on the stage before, but I have never seen a crime re-constituted so pitilessly and ruthlessly as in this play. The triangular duel between magistrate, maid, and murderer is really very skilfully worked out, because though Raskolnikoff does confess at last, it is not the magistrate who makes him, but the girl. He is a sceptic, a freethinker, and a pagan. Her simple faith touches him in the end, and he bows—not to her ikons, but to the spirit which they create in her, and then goes off to prison to serve his sentence. When he comes out it is pretty clear that the two will marry, and I was interested to learn that three years would be the utmost length of the murderer-hero's incarceration.

Miss Mabel Hackney is pretty and pathetic, but not quite at her best in such parts as this, but Mr. Irving was excellent, despite an occasional tendency to over-act—or, rather, to relapse into the exaggerated mannerisms of his father. He has written and produced a bold and attractive play, and I hope he will reap the reward of his courage.

"Eccentric Lord Comberdene," at the St. James's.

No one shall say that Mr. Alexander has not given us something fresh in Mr. R. C. Carton's "novelette in three chapters." Not since Bret Harte in his condensed novels parodied so amusingly the work of Miss Braddon and her school has sensational fiction been so cleverly scarified. It is mocked at, satirised, and burlesqued throughout three acts, and if the penny novelette of commerce has any sensitiveness it will surely never be able to hold up its head again. Picture Lord Comberdene, gay, irresponsible, and in the habit of being all things to all women, suddenly losing his heart to Mrs. Adair's maid, and then discovering that Mrs. Adair is not Mrs. Adair really, but the Marchioness of Glenmoray, and that the maid is the Grand Duchess Ina Drovinski, who is being smuggled out of England to escape from Nihilists! Meanwhile a gang of international thieves, in the guise of clergymen, hotel bores, and milliners, are rampaging round because the Marchioness has accidentally and innocently come into possession of her own jewels, of which they had so carefully and craftily relieved her. The wildest flights of realism must pale their ineffectual fires before romance of this order, and you can imagine with what zest Mr. Alexander puts himself, his millions, and his yacht at the service of the Marchioness, her royal maid, and her mysterious box. "Once aboard your lugger," says Miss Compton, "we shall be safe"—but the difficulty is how to get there, for the hotel in which one and all are staying is infested with cut-throats, Nihilists, and thieves. Lord Comberdene, however, is equal to any emergency. In a jiffy he gets the sheets from the Marchioness's bed and lowers that august lady by means of them from the balcony to the sands. In a trice her Royal Highness goes dangling down the same way, while almost before you can say "Jack Robinson" he has circumvented two of the worst villains and locked them up in the Royal bedroom. The third act, showing the deck of the Morning Star, is equally thrilling, because Captain Clamp and the crew of desperadoes whom Mr. Alexander has engaged are all myrmidons in the pay of the gang of international thieves; but would you be surprised to hear that just when matters are at their worst a distress signal hoisted by capable Miss Compton brings a boat's crew from H.M.S. "Irresistible" alongside in less than two minutes (this shows you how smart and efficient is our Navy), and virtue triumphs while vice is driven under hatches.

The one thing that troubled me was that Mr. Alexander could not marry pretty Miss Rita Jolivet, who played the Grand Duchess. She was so charming, and spoke French-English so prettily, that she ought not to have been allowed to go back to Russia. Surely a British peer endowed with millions is good enough for Russian royalty? Mr. Alexander revels in the part of the erratic peer with no wife, at least, "not one of his own," as one of the characters remarks. He attacks the part as though he thoroughly enjoyed its intentional absurdities, and his life and spirits are of the utmost value in keeping the ball rolling, for "Eccentric Lord Comberdene" is a play about which the audience must not be allowed to think too much. It is just a piece of mad nonsense in which everyone has to hustle, and keep on hustling, like the Chicago frog. Of course, nothing would make Miss Compton hustle. She is her old imperturbable self, never put out, never flustered, never missing a point, and she makes a capital foil to the others. Mr. J. H. Barnes is a very nicely truculent Captain Clamp, and Mr. Lyston Lyle is excellent as Radburn, one of the leaders of the International Thieving Society. It is a risky experiment, because I remember that some years ago Mr. Cecil Raleigh tried the same game with burlesque melodrama, and without much success. In any case I admire the spirit of adventure which Mr. Alexander has shown in producing the play, but I could wish that he had persuaded Mr. Carton to blue-pencil a few of the political allusions.

* * * * * *

The new divertissement "Ship Ahoy" at the Empire is a gay little spectacle in watching which you may spend a very pleasant hour. The scene is the deck of a battleship. The construction is most careful and realistic, and there is not a dull moment in the whole thing from the time when a most attractive band of barefooted lady bluejackets swab the decks to the final night scene when these decks are festooned with lanterns and merriment is in full swing. There is a plot of sorts, but this I did not bother my head about much. I was too much taken up with watching the brilliantly eccentric dancing of Mr. Fred Farren and the fascinating evolutions of Mlle. Lydia Kyasht, while dainty little Miss Phyllis Bedells has excellent opportunities of showing herself one of the most promising dancers we have. Miss Unity Moore also comes in as a very good fourth.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

I AM informed that King George's first visit to Newmarket next year will take place during the Second July Meeting. His Majesty would probably have attended the First July Meeting, but for its clashing with the Royal Agricultural Society's show at Norwich, during which the King and Queen will receive a number of guests at Sandringham. The Stewards of the Jockey Club would have done well to postpone their own fixture until July 4, and the meetings in the South of England which are arranged for the first week in July might have been brought forward to the last week in June. The Norwich show must inevitably interfere seriously with the meeting at Newmarket, whereas it would not injure fixtures at Stockbridge and Lingfield.

If all goes well with Swynford during the winter he ought to train into a very fine four-year-old, and it may be hoped that he will turn out a Cup horse of really high class, as he can certainly stay. Swynford will, of course "go" for the Ascot Cup, and he may be seen out a fortnight earlier in the Coronation Cup at Epsom, but the course there would not probably suit him so well. Swynford is engaged in the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot, the race in which he gained his first success at the last meeting, and a fortnight later he is entered for the Princess of Wales Stakes at Newmarket. This race is run over the severe Suffolk Stakes course, and Lord Derby's horse will have 5 lbs. the best of the weights with Lemberg. The pair are also engaged in the Eclipse Stakes, when they would meet at even weights. Swynford is entered for the Atlantic Stakes at the Liverpool July meeting, and in the autumn he is in the Jockey Club Stakes, when he will meet Lemberg at 4 lbs. Lord Derby, however, might prefer to run Stedfast in this race if he is all right, as the colt has a breeding allowance of 9 lbs.

I remarked some weeks ago that there will be no necessity for the Stewards of the Jockey Club to render the pecuniary conditions of the Two Thousand and the One Thousand more attractive while they continue to be so generously patronised by owners. One hundred and twenty-five yearlings have been entered for the Two Thousand of 1912," which is a really astonishing subscription for a race which is merely a sweepstake of £100 each, half forfeit. There are 115 entries for next year's Two Thousand. Mr. Whitney is the largest subscriber for 1912 with six yearlings bred in the United States. The King has four entries, and so also has Mr. S. Joel. Ninety-eight fillies have been engaged in the One Thousand of 1912, and there are ninety-four entries for next year's race. The Duke of Portland is the largest subscriber in 1912 with five, and next come Mr. Whitney and Mr. H. B. Duryea, each with four. There are remarkably large entries for some of next season's two-year-old races at Newmarket. Forty-nine yearlings have been engaged in the Granby Plate at the Craven Meeting, and the greater part (if not all) of the value of this stake (£200) will be got back by the entrances. There are fifty-nine entries for the First Spring Stakes, with £200 added, the entrances amounting to £177. Seventy fillies have been entered for the Cheveley Park Stakes at the Second October Meeting, and £350 of the £500 which is nominally added is recovered by the entrances. The Moulton Park Stakes at the Houghton Meeting has sixty-five entries, and the entrances bring back all the added money except £5.

The entry for the Dullingham Plate at the Second July Meeting is very interesting, and it may be studied with advantage, for valuable hints can be gathered from it. The entry of older horses includes Lemberg, Sir Martin, Greenback, Declare, Thalia, and Bronzino. Among the now two-year-olds are Seaforth, Cellini, Black Potts, and Atmah.

There are forty-four entries for the King George Stakes, the new T.Y.C. race at Goodwood, with £1,000 added. All the smartest sprinters in training have been engaged, but it is rather surprising to find Seaforth in the list. Among the other now two-year-olds are Mushroom, Prince San, Stedfast, St. Nat, Cellini, Meleager, Wrinkler, St. Anton, and Black Potts. The list of older horses includes Sunder, Hallaton, Winkipop, Mustapha, Sunshine, Glenesky, Sir Martin, and Whisk Broom. There is ample material here for a really great race.

A new feature at Goodwood during the next three years is a Private Sweepstakes, to run five furlongs at two years old, one mile at three years old, and the Cup Course at four years old. There are thirty-two entries, the subscribers being Mr. L. Brassey, Lord Cadogan, Lord Durham, Lord Derby, Lord Falmouth, Lord Ilchester, and Lord Villiers. The sweepstakes is somewhat paltry for a race of this class, being merely £10 each year, £50 extra for starters. The only practical method to produce a race for such a stake is to have a heavy sweepstakes, and let it be an affair of p.p.

There are only ten subscribers for the Prince of Wales Post Sweepstakes of £200 each for 1912. There would have been double the number if any suitable person had been set to work canvassing for entries. This is now the only method to keep a race of this class alive. His Majesty heads the list. One of Lord Rosebery's foals is a half-brother, by Bachelor's Button, to Neil Gow; and one of the Duke of Westminster's pair is a half-sister, by Troutbeck, to Flying Fox.

The Sporting Times is, of course, quite right in asserting that Hester was "got at" for the Oaks of 1870, and there never was a more thoroughly successful case of nobbling. It must be a slip of the pen, however, that "the late Lord Derby" is credited with having laid £5,000 on Hester. It was the late Lord Dudley who lost £5,000 over Hester, and Mr. F. Pryor (owner of The Rake and Cardinal York) was "had" for £3,000. Lord Stamford was also a heavy loser. The Lord Derby of 1870 never betted a shilling in his life, and it is very doubtful if he ever visited a racecourse. Hester was never worth sixpence after being "got at," either for racing or at the stud. Lord Dudley, however, got off very easily at Epsom that year, for he had offered to bet £25,000 to £10,000 on Macgregor for the Derby. The fact of such a bet being refused is conclusive proof that the tales about Macgregor having been got at were all moonshine. Mr. Merry probably lost the Derby by starting Macgregor for a trumpery stake at Bath, where the course was as hard as a turnpike road. The Bath meeting was a Moscow campaign for Mr. Merry in 1870, as Perth, who broke down after running there, was one of the highest tried two-year-olds he had ever owned. Perth was better than King of the Forest, who made a successful début at Ascot.

The Chesterfield Nursery at Derby is generally regarded as the most important race of that class, and it has every year brought out a large field, generally including several two-year-olds of fairly high quality, while the betting is always heavy. This year's race was generally regarded as a good thing for the colt by The Gull out of Derelict, who had showed promising form both at Newbury and at Liverpool, and he started favourite. Highwayside and Lowlander were very much fancied, but Black Potts, who was the great Newmarket tip, did not start. Writing a fortnight ago, I expressed the opinion that either Bahati or Seashell would win, and this prediction proved correct, as Mr. L. de Rothschild's filly won cleverly, after having made all the running. Her success was the more satisfactory inasmuch as she started at the generous price of 10 to 1. Bahati was exceedingly well handicapped on her best running, and it is strange that she was not more generally fancied, as it was believed that she had come back to her spring form.

Lord Derby was well advised in not starting Stedfast for the Rangemore Stakes, as his colt is one of the most promising two-year-olds in training, and it would do him no good to knock him about at this period of his career for the sake of winning races of trumpery value. Badoura, who won in a common canter, had run Stedfast to a neck at Liverpool, when she had 13 lbs. the best of the weights. Badoura was well galloped in the spring, but she went amiss after running at Lincoln. There was no great merit about her performance at Derby, as she really had nothing to beat, and the odds freely betted on her were landed without even the semblance of a struggle.

The back-end handicaps have been under a blight this season. The Liverpool Cup excited very little interest, and the Derby Cup brought out the smallest field on record for this valuable race. Last Call was a great public fancy, and a strong tip from Newmarket, but he ran very badly, and he must have gone off considerably since he performed so well at Newbury. Accurate came with a rush in the betting at the finish, and there was some heavy wagering. The Valet was very prominent for over a mile, after which he disappeared, and the race ended in a most exciting finish between Columbus and Merry Task. The winner had been placed third in the Cesarewitch, and he had probably come on during the last few weeks, but many good judges were of the opinion that Merry Task ought to have won.

The Manchester November Handicap will be run on Saturday, and there are twenty-three acceptances. I fancy Accurate.

DEAR GOLF BALLS—CRICKET—EPPING FOREST.

A correspondent urges me to raise a protest about the price of golf balls. The price is still half-a-crown, although rubber has fallen from 11s. to 6s. a pound. The price of balls was raised because of the increase in the price of the raw material. Now the raw material is down the price of balls should follow suit. I read that leading golf clubs are going to warn the manufacturers that they will only permit 2s. balls to be sold on their links. Such an association of consumers would be a novelty. I have no doubt manufacturers will keep up prices as long as they can. It may be that they have bought rubber "forward" and are still taking delivery at higher prices than those at which they could purchase to-day. As a mere matter of business they will therefore keep up the price until they are forced to sell at a lower price owing to the competition of purchasers at a lower price. Equally, too, those who buy rubber low will not worry if golf balls remain high. Wherefore it may occur to the consumer that if prices are once up against him they have a tendency to stick there. It is all very well for the golfer to cry out about imposition, abuse of trade, rings, and trusts. There are some quite decent 2s. balls on the market. Be content with an unknown brand, and the known brand will soon come down.

But, of course, Mr Balfour pointed out the real remedy at Nottingham. He said that a tax on foreign corn would not be felt. It would be lost or submerged in the ordinary rise and fall of the material. Moreover, it would so stimulate wheat production that the area of supply would be increased and bread would be cheaper. But if by any unhappy chance the price of bread was raised then he would take off the increase from the tea, sugar, and cocoa taxes. He says no Radical can misunderstand him. The only difficulty is to understand him. But if he says it is so, of course it will be o—somewhen. Now apply the same principle to rubber. You put a tax of 4s. a pound on foreign rubber—not on colonial rubber. Assume the foreigner then pays the tax, then the member of the London Stock Exchange who is a golfer and holds foreign rubber shares will be paying the duty on his own golf balls. Meanwhile the duty on rubber which he pays will so stimulate production that other rubber companies will be formed. These he will float off on the public. But, production being stimulated, his original shares will be worth less money because that company will be getting less for its rubber, but his golf balls will be cheaper, and so he will be better off. Of course, to make the theory work properly the duty of four shillings must be put on just as rubber is falling from eleven shillings to six shillings. Then if the foreigner will not pay the tax the cost of rubber would only be ten shillings. It would therefore be cheaper than when it was taxed, which shows that a tax makes no difference in price, but on the contrary makes things cheaper. Of course, some Free Trade idiot is bound to say that if there were no duty rubber would be six shillings But the Tariff Reformer points out that golf balls would still be two and sixpence each, so it is all nonsense to say a tax makes any difference. The same tame idiot will also say that if rubber had kept at eleven shillings it would have put the price of balls up to fifteen shillings, whereupon the scientific golfer says if that is so, and it will not be so, but if it is so Mr. Balfour will at once take the tax off the club whisky, and so you will be no worse off than before. Wherefore I advise my golfing friend to concentrate his intelligence on Tariff Reform. A tax on everything will so stimulate production that everything will be cheaper. He will be able to lose golf balls with equanimity. If everything is dearer then Mr. Balfour will no doubt take off the income tax. This will not help those who do not pay income tax. But Tariff Reform means cheap golf balls. Of that there is no doubt unless you doubt the accuracy of Mr. Balfour's economics or have some recollections that he has made promises that have not materialised. Speaking personally, I have never known taxes stimulate anything but bad language. Therein they resemble golf. But for the life of me I cannot see why, if taxes on foreign corn and foreign wood are going to make those articles cheaper, a tax on foreign rubber should not make golf balls cheaper.

My attention has been called to a correspondence in the Chronicle on golf in Epping Forest. I know the course, and to suggest that the public enjoyment of the Forest is in any way interfered with is absurd. Besides, the Corporation of the City acquired these lands under a special Act. They administer them under that Act for the benefit of the people, not of the City, but of the realm. The Corporation were practically the pioneers of municipal golf in this country. The L.C.C. has followed suit at Hainault Forest. By this means men who cannot afford big clubs and heavy subscriptions get their game. They in their turn pay their rates and taxes, and help to support those parks under the control of the L.C.C. where cricket, tennis, bowls, and football are played, and ground is monopolised for sport. And very healthy sport it is. No one with an atom of sense grudges either the ground or the expense. There is plenty of forest at Chingford, and if these golf critics want to squat on an open piece of grass and enjoy what they think are their rights they can go to Hyde Park. But when they talk of public rights in the Forest they must remember that they enjoy the amenities of the Forest as guests of the Corporation, whose statutory rule they have to obey, and which rule the Corporation has to enforce. People are too prone to prate about rights when they have merely public privileges.

Both South Africans and Australians may rest assured that the doings of their cricketers are being watched with great interest in this played-out island. The papers are giving full reports just as they do when the M.C.C. are touring either in Africa or Australia. Naturally one is watching the new players in Australia in view of the coming international cricket year. In 1912 both Colonial teams will be here. Our cricket authorities are already contemplating a portentous series of trial games in 1911 in order to see who will be fit to play in 1912. This procedure strikes one to be about as wise as if a University team were made up a year beforehand. But our selection committee are men of such intelligence that whatever the weather may be when these trial games are played, they will stick to these players in 1912, and if a fast bowler is not wanted in those games he will not be played in the following year. Of course, the players must not be too young. Anything under thirty-five is mere nursery age. Such players are only just toodling into county cricket. If you have rheumatism your chances of playing are increased. It is said that a certain fast bowler who did not play when the Australians were over here protested vehemently. He averred he had a touch of rheumatics. What further qualification did the selection committee require? One hopes, too, that the captain that is selected, whoever he may be, will have sufficient moral courage to retire if he finds himself out of form.

must be counted Hampshire, and the reason is that, win or lose, they play bright cheerful cricket. That is the cause of failure in many counties. Hampshire was just as much bothered by the weather as other first-class teams. It is all balderdash to attribute the general county deficit to heavy taxation. Hants has put itself right by gate-money. Those who make the gate money are not burdened with super-tax or unearned increments. Middlesex is in a bad way, and so is Essex. For the latter a shilling subscription is to be started. I do hope it will be successful. The club is really on its last legs. It is said its cricket is not attractive. That is a pity. Essex seems to lack any county spirit and the other side of the river (Kent) possesses it in abundance. These things be strange, and no man can explain them. Local feeling and local patriotism is indigenous in some counties. In others it is non-existent. As to Middlesex, it suffers from its policy of Colonial importations. It does nothing to work up county talent. It fails, therefore, in any sense to be a county team. And yet it has the metropolis to draw on for gate-money and for players.

Trinity Hall supplied the two men in the final for the Colquhoun sculls on the Cam. Swann, in the semi-final, only got home against Pattisson, of Jesus, by a fraction of a second. However, he held and beat the favourite, C. M. Stuart, by a small margin in the final. Congratulations to him and his ancestor.

THE SEVEN AGES OF GOLF.

(Suggested by a recent advertisement.)

All the world's a course,
And all the men and women really golfers;
They have their clubs, and subs, and entrance fees,
And one man in his time plays many rounds
At seven different stages. First the infant
Fussing and foozling in his nurse's arms;
Then th' enthusiastic schoolboy in his teens,
With shiny cleek and brassey (secondhand),
Who takes his early round. And then the lover
Sighing like furnace o'er a bunkered ball
Or foozled putt. And then the bachelor
Full of wild oaths and reckless like the bard,
Jealous of others, keen to growl and quarrel,
Seeking a golfing reputation
Even in the bunker's mouth. And the senior
In wide round breeks and peaceful frame of mind,
With beaming eye, and bald about the pate,
Full of quaint rules, and modern instances,
And so he plays his part. The sixth stage comes,
And now with grizzled locks, and worn-out irons,
With spectacles upon his pink proboscis,
He drives, he putts, is stymied, tries to putt
While others take their knock. His withering form
Goes gingerly along from hole to hole,
Led by his caddie. While Last Scene of all
That ends the story (and my parody)
Is ripe old age, still on the same old game,
Sans sight, sans skill, sans luck, sans everything.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

COMMENTS and criticisms on the late show continue to occupy space in the motoring press. On one point there is pretty general agreement—namely, as to the inconvenience caused by the too heavy attendance and the need of remedying matters in this respect in future by raising the price of admission; and also it might be added by restricting the number of free tickets. It is quite evident that these are issued at present in too lavish a manner altogether.

The result was particularly noticeable on the five-shilling day in the presence of hundreds and hundreds of visitors, mostly of the mechanic class, who had manifestly not paid five shillings at the doors. It is in fact well known that these free tickets are distributed broadcast throughout the trade, and as the practice results in the greatest inconvenience to those who have paid for admission, and indirectly to the disadvantage of the trade itself, its discontinuance is clearly called for. As a matter of fact the attendance on the five-shilling day seemed to be quite as large as on any of the others, and the Society is understood to be now seriously considering the desirability of instituting a ten-shilling or pound day next year. But even this measure will be of little avail if the holders of free passes are still admitted in unlimited numbers. What is really wanted, of course, is a larger building for the show, but as this does not exist at present in London the only alternative is to make the best of the existing conditions.

Some years ago Mr. Filson Young made the suggestion that these annual exhibitions should be run not by the trade at all, but by the Royal Automobile Club on strictly educational lines. He deprecated the shrieking sky-signs, the glaring lights, the competing exhibitors, and the general atmosphere of blatant commercialism distinguishing the show at present, and pleaded for an exhibition conceived on more scientific and less head-achy lines. In a word, he conceived of a show designed to appeal to experts and students only.

If I remember rightly, his suggestion was that cars and chassis should be arranged in logical sequence, beginning with the smallest and cheapest and proceeding by stages until the most powerful and most complex were reached; experts were to be in attendance to offer suitable explanations; and in the result the intelligent visitor was to learn as much as possible with the maximum of ease and the minimum of discomfort. This was, of course, a counsel of impossibility as regards the show as we know it, if only for the reason that this is designed primarily not for educational purposes at all, but for purely commercial ends. But it is doubtful, all the same, if, even as a frankly business proposition, the exhibition on its present lines is as well conceived as it might be. It would be as well, therefore, if the whole question were reconsidered between now and next November.

Comment has often been made on the absurd tendency of some writers to use foreign words in place of English ones. Sometimes, of course, when no English equivalent exists, the use of such words is almost unavoidable, and, for good or ill, several have fairly established themselves in motoring terminology. "Chauffeur" is one; "chassis" is another; and others could be named. Many regret this, and valiant efforts were made to keep out "chauffeur," for instance, when it was originally introduced. Why use this barbarous French word (asked the purists) when motorman, motor-driver, and various other English words could be used instead?

Still, "chauffeur" held its own, as such words so often do, in spite of all the purists, and it is hardly likely to be expelled now. As a matter of fact, we have no recognised English word which would convey precisely the same meaning. When, however, we have such words, it is absurd to import foreign ones, and, therefore, one is entitled to protest against the growing use of the word "carrosserie" by motoring writers. Seeing that "coach work," "carriage work," and "body work" are all well-established English terms, it seems the superfluity of naughtiness to drag in "carrosserie." Away with it, therefore!

In reference to a recent paragraph in TRUTH commenting on the difficulty sometimes experienced in obtaining an ambulance in London, the manager of the Hire Department of Messrs. Daimler (78, Marylebone Lane, Oxford Street, W.) writes to say that his firm have a couple of excellent motor ambulances for hire, and that they do a very great deal of work with them for various nursing homes and West End doctors. "Never a week passes," he says, "but we have to convey patients either from or to London long distances, even to Wales and Cornwall, and we are frequently ordered to meet boats at Southampton or Dover to bring patients up to London." I give publicity to this communication with pleasure, since it is not at all generally known at present that such motor-ambulances are obtainable. The advantages of the automobile—swift, smooth-running, and silent—for ambulance purposes hardly need dwelling on.

From the point of view of the practical motorist one of the most interesting exhibits at the recent show was that of Almagam, Limited, the firm which seems to have discovered something like a real substitute for rubber, or at all events a rubberised compound which is much cheaper than the genuine article, and at the same time wonderfully durable. Here were to be seen, for instance, some re-treated Goodrich covers, 935 by 135, off a 45-h.p. Daimler used by the Daily Mail, which, as a letter from the manager testified, had done nearly 2,000 miles, and still had a considerable further mileage in them, and various other examples bearing equally striking testimony to the efficiency of this new material. Yet the cost of re-treating with Almagam is, I believe, about half that entailed in the case of genuine rubber. No wonder, therefore, that many motorists are going in for it. I propose to do so myself before long. The curious name, by the way, deserves a word of explanation. It should, of course, be Amalgam, but the company could not register this, and so they chose "Almagam" as the nearest substitute.

The cars shown at Olympia the other day exhibited numerous improvements of one sort and another, but one still tarries, and this is the adoption of uniform and standardised nuts. Since the very earliest days of the movement motorists have petitioned for this reform, but the makers remain obstinately unresponsive, and are almost as far off anything in the nature of a common practice at present as ever. Here is surely a matter in regard to which the Technical Committee of the Royal Automobile Club might well take action. Difficulties would present themselves, no doubt. Considerable cost would be entailed in many cases, probably, in making the change. But a conference might be held on the subject. If even individual makers would introduce a little more system into their practice this would be something. Two or three double-ended spanners ought to suffice for all the nuts on any car, if not for all the nuts on all cars.

Six-cylinder NOISELESS NAPIER cars are immensely popular in India, the Viceroy and many native Princes all favouring them. Napiers are the best and British-built, and are suitable for all countries.

The Commissioner of Police has taken a useful step in the notice which he has issued regarding the practice of crossing from the left side of the road in the face of the oncoming line of traffic in order to set down on the right side. The proper course, as the Commissioner points out, is for the driver to go a little beyond his destination, turn round, and fall into the other line of traffic, and then draw in to the kerb in the ordinary way. In this case as little disturbance of the other traffic as possible is caused, whereas when the other course is adopted the maximum of confusion is entailed. It may be added, too, that when the proper course is followed the vehicle is then properly placed for continuing its journey instead of having to draw off again in the face of the approaching stream of traffic.

If the Commissioner would go further and forbid vehicles to stand by the kerb at all in narrow and busy streets he would earn the gratitude of the travelling public—assuming that he has it in his power to do this, as to which I am not quite sure. Nothing is more absurd than the amount of latitude at present allowed in this respect. All such vehicles should be turned down the nearest side street to wait. There they would not be in any one's way, while the main street would be left free for traffic. As it is, one may frequently see a thoroughfare such as Bond Street—already woefully narrow—reduced to the merest passage-way by this ridiculous custom of allowing carriages to stand outside shops and block it up throughout the greater part of its length.

interest in two main topics of the week, Francomania and the suffrage. It now seems probable that he will represent a suffragist in an action against the Home Secretary, which is at least a beginning.

We both went to hear Lady Stout, wife of the Chief Justice of New Zealand, speak on New Zealand women at Lady Brassey's last week, and as James was nearly the only man there he attracted a good deal of attention. The latest descendant of Western feminism gave excellent and naïve advice in the divan, which, with its Oriental carvings, its lounges, cushions, and hangings, irresistibly calls up suggestions of harems. In New Zealand, where women have votes, there seems to be little drink and less vice; hardly anybody ventures to be illegitimate and twins rain upon the country only to find that "comforters," tube feeding-bottles, and rockers can't be had for love or money. The women, far from being escorted everywhere by policemen and taken to the police-court in batches of 113, may ring up the Prime Minister at any hour of the day or night without fear of his being impolite, which to me explains Mr. Asquith's attitude a little. Indeed I am not at all sure that it is not a very good plan to have withheld votes from women for a time in order to reap the vast benefits of conferring it upon them. I am sure, by the way, that in New Zealand nobody leaves a meeting before the end, however long the speaker may require to finish his periods. Indeed, if New Zealand were a little nearer London it would be quite nice to have a cottage there. For besides the Southern Cross, which you could get people down to see, the virtues of the New Zealander would be so inducive of dulness as to provide the perfect rest and freedom from worry prescribed nowadays for half one's friends.

At the dinner given to Mr. Vivian, M.P., for his services in Canadian town-planning, James very nearly got up and joined several uninvited guests in saying "Votes for Women." When I pulled him down, pointing out that he had got his new evening suit on, and that I couldn't go home alone, he retorted that he wanted to show Mr. Burns that "Go home and rock the baby" did not always apply. As this was derived verbatim from a gibe of Lady Stout, I see I shall have to be very careful where I take James in future.

On Thursdays, about tea-time, you can hardly move in John Street, Adelphi, for the number of chauffeurs awaiting the issue of their mistresses from the "Causeries de Jeudi" at the Little Theatre. The rule "Hats off" is not yet good form, in spite of the spacious accommodation provided. On the contrary, you only remove your hat if you come earnest and early to improve your French. A late arrival—a large hat ringed with whole ostriches, and a corner seat to ensure departure a little before the time—imply that your accent is beyond reproach. You will gather the high degree of fluency in a foreign tongue at the Little Theatre when I tell you that one enthusiast, who, I expect, has many times been described as being "beautifully gowned," remarked to a young gentleman in silk socks and a waistcoat of reindeer that really M. Hahn had an excellent accent.

M. Reynaldo Hahn, the "causeur" for the afternoon, reminded me, from reasons of nomenclature, so forcibly of La Fontaine that I found myself murmuring, "tenait en son bec un fromage." In the light of a shaded lamp he might almost be described as pretty, and his "oeillades," propelled by soft, dark lashes, went right home every time. "L'éducation musicale de la femme"—it means that most girls should mostly not play pianos—reinforced by lantern-slides of St. Cecilias from Greek times to Whistler, provided him with a subject which he expounded with much greater subtlety and grace than was the case with his somewhat unmelodious "Chœur de Dames."

The new motor-'bus running down Bond Street is looked on generally with grave suspicion, not only by the old horse 'bus, but by the shopper proper. Incidentally, everybody uses it in order, later, to be able the better to express disapproval of the innovation. When James went to have his hair cut the other day he said that it certainly made for greater tidiness in Bond Street to have sixteen—and occasionally seventeen, with one standing up—heavily furred, super-hatted women removed from a stationary position before shop articles they have no intention of buying, and neatly stowed away in its capacious maw

I met James afterwards at the Post-Impressionists, who made him laugh so noticeably that I had to take him out before he had seen everything. You and the girls would, I am sure, see more in them than meets the material eye. Personally, they reminded me of the little girl who, being taken by her father out to call, got bored, and was sent into the garden to play. When her father went to look for her, he found her emerging from the dust-heap and holding up a large dead cat by the tail. "Daddy," she cried, with concern, "here's quite a good cat!"

Prince Kropotkin, whose daughter was married on Tuesday, always makes me more sympathetic towards your rather miscellaneous Russians than would otherwise be the case For at least the author of the "Memoirs of a Russian Revolutionist" is bonâ fide. He really had vast estates in Russia, really is a prince—a Russian prince—long-bearded and patriarchal, and if he did not actually escape from Siberia in a barrel, at least one of his friends was shut up in the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, there to lose his hearing in the intense silence. Princess Kropotkin, dark-haired, brown-eyed, and of the Slav type, is essentially cheerful and energetic, and her daughter somewhat resembles her, though long years in England have given her an English air as well as an entirely English accent. I know Russians who come over here and, settling down comfortably, proceed to incite the tyrant-ridden English to rebellion. But Prince Kropotkin, withal his large English acquaintance, wisely confines himself to mitigating the lot of those of his countrymen in Siberia for whom so far barrels have proved unavailable. ## A WOMAN'S MASTERPIECE.

From the advance accounts of "Marie-Claire" it was easy to imagine that the unusual circumstances surrounding its authorship were responsible for some at least of the enthusiasm with which Paris was acclaiming the book. The spectacle of a hard-working, illiterate seamstress, poor, and rapidly going blind, producing a book which carries off the Goncourt prize, was surely sufficient excuse, in a country where feeling is a virtue, for exalting a quiet narration of childhood in the country into a masterpiece. The story came out last week, and the reviews gave much the same impression—they failed to convey the greatness they proclaimed.

There is no newspaper reader in England who does not know by this time that Marguerite Audoux has written the story of her childhood; that that childhood was passed, first in a convent, then as shepherdess on a farm; then in the convent again; that the book stops short where she leaves the convent for Paris; and that it is called "Marie-Claire." Beyond that, they probably have no definite notion of the kind of book it is.

The outstanding feature of it is the amazing way in which art and nature are one. The severest stylist could not have selected more austerely and admirably the incidents for portrayal; the highest art could not have more pitilessly shorn the language of tricks and adornments. One begins to see, in reading this production of an unlettered dressmaker, what it is that those men aim at who spend days seeking for the right word. It is the quality of uncoloured observation. The detachment in "Marie-Claire" is as pronounced as the minute observation. One has the sensation that Marguerite Audoux keeps her memories in a cabinet as a collector keeps china; and in her book she takes one round at night with a dark lantern. The light falls on one treasure after another in a clearly defined circle; a few dusky images cluster round the light, beyond all is black. Then, with the suddenness of a surprise, the lantern shifts to a new object. In this way one comes to know with complete clearness the kind of incidents which made up Marie-Claire's life; from that one knows the life itself better than from any general exposition of it.

The women are particularly well illuminated. The men exist chiefly through their eyes and their voices, the women exist as wholes. The Mother Superior of the convent looms sinister in the background, a black figure in a red chair, with vengeful, cold eyes and a mocking voice. Sister Marie-Aimée, harsh, unexpected, but lovable and loving, is sketched with a sure hand, and Madeleine, the convent nurse, appears most vividly in the flash where, during a general chase after the cat, she is said to have "followed Sister Marie-Aimée with the movements of a rather heavy young dog." Colette, the cripple, who expects to be cured by a miracle, so that she may marry; Ismerie, the clever, insolent dwarf; Esther, the kindly, uncomprehending nurse—they all live by virtue of a few sentences.

The life at the farm is equally vivid. We see the tiny pearl-like drops upon the fleeces of the sheep in a fog; when one is bitten by a viper, and its head swells to enormous proportions, the nightmare-like appearance of it comes before us with the same horror that drove Marie-Claire from it. The people at the farm are not quite in the circle of the dark lantern, with the exception of the farmer's brother, who had a curious silent friendship with the farmer's child. They sat together on a bench by the door on summer evenings listening to a melancholy owl in an old elm, and sometimes to a voice which set the child shivering with unexplained emotion. One gathers it was a nightingale.

There followed death and separation, and a new mistress came to the farm who cared for nothing under heaven but linen. Marie-Claire was eighteen, and the romance which came to her is told with a vividness, and yet a restraint, which one perceives that high art must have borrowed from nature in more sophisticated writers. It ends with the same abruptness and simplicity, and we are not troubled with any outpourings about Marie-Claire's feelings. We are only told what she does. She goes back to the convent, and in this last part of the book we have the finest work of all, in Sœur Désirée-des-Anges, with the beautiful quiet face, and the lurking sense of fun, who is afterwards revealed as curly-haired Désirée Joly, who used to jump so high that she was reproved for showing her knees.

In reading this book, and thinking of the work of women novelists in England, it was impossible not to concede superiority to Marie-Claire. Every word is dictated by a sense of rightness which results in the restraint of good breeding, the simplicity of great art, the clearness of country seen under a broad flash of lightning, and the insight into character which comes from properly chosen words. When the theme is romance the reticence is particularly grateful. English women writers are prone to err upon the other side. They might learn many lessons from this exquisite book; how not to draw morals, how to leave things unsaid, how to put in background without devoting paragraphs to description. Marie-Claire seems to me to sum up the duty of the novelist into three words—see and say. There is no adding, no expanding; above all, the emotional note is never drab. It strikes a note in woman's work which is in need of sounding.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—The metropolis and I were in a fog this early morning, and the far, far better way pointed towards Brighton. Here I found the sun shining with such forceful vigour that I wandered to the beach, and in solitary want of state, and, doubtless, some conspicuous want of elegance, stretched myself upon its stones and basked in a heat which made my best furs a superfluous burden.

It was an amazing change from the gloom of town, and I decided to telegraph to William to come and enjoy it with me. He will probably urge a sick maiden-aunt, with testamentary possibilities, should the suggestion not entirely meet his convenience.

Walking back to my hotel, where I sojourn in excellent rooms, with bow windows and balconies commanding my beloved sea, I met H. B. Irving and Dorothea Baird, looking entirely charming, with a long black velvet scarf wound about her slender neck, and a black, soft, beaver Robin Hood hat, with a dull silver clasp upon its upturned brim. By their side skipped their beautiful daughter, with red-gold hair, crowned with a brown cap, falling in masses over a red-gold velvet coat, her every movement making for joy and grace. They were a gladsome trio.

And then I lunched well, not to say greedily, and, like Johnny of fame, went to the Fair. This was held in the Dome, in parish interests, and most generously patronised. There was a capital pageant of Old Brighton. The articles for sale were numerous and not costly, while decorated dogs and human bears were amongst the pleaders; Puritan maidens in grey with white caps dispensed tea with a dexterity unusual in the amateur; a clever artist executed silhouettes for the modest fee of three a shilling; and ecclesiastical representatives had come not single spies, but in battalions.

Later I shopped to discover the excellence of the éclairs at Barbellion's, and to bear several home regardless of the chance that their sticky charms might mar the embroidery of my further purchase. But after all I neither ate nor worked, for I became absorbed in a novel, and did not abandon its fascinations until two o'clock in the morning, when I fell asleep.

Friday.—I awoke to find the sun again doing its duty over the sea, and that the postman had brought me news that William would motor down to lunch. He had only three or four hours to spare before he was due to solace his sick aunt. Oh, that sick aunt! I felt her claims were due, but three or four hours should quite exhaust William's sentimental confidences, and I am going to dine at the Métropole Hotel with the G.'s. I met them on the front, where I went to watch Fashion as she is writ in Brighton.

She is writ large in velveteen. The shops in the King's Road all display velveteen coats and skirts, braided or plain, the only exception to the rule being a costume in raven blue charmeuse, inscribed "Parisian" in large letters, and indelibly bearing, to the experienced eye, the date 1909.

Not only in the shops is the velveteen dress reigning supreme, for every second woman has possessed herself of one and crowned it with a cloche hat in black, and with her neck enwrapped in a fur scarf she struts proudly about, as like to her sister as if the charms of individuality were negligible quantities.

The blouse to wear beneath the coat absorbed a few of my vagrant thoughts as I walked along, to be interrupted ever and again by some friend who had cleverly followed my example, or forestalled it, and escaped the first breath of fresh fog in the city. Thin stuffs are mainly acceptable for blouses, plain or figured ninon for choice, the former lined with lace glistening with metal or beads. Porcelain beads on net are permitted to grace many an over-blouse. A good mode might have a white foundation covered with black and aluminium lace overdraped with fine black chiffon hand-embroidered in black silk and pale blue opalescent trifles. An entire bodice made of black-and-gold lace might be accepted undraped, the points of the lace fastening down the front and buttoned across with little straps of black velvet. This should be cut on shirt lines, and a superior shirt is ever a comfortable and becoming circumstance. Nothing could be better than to achieve it in luxurious fabrics to preserve the illusion of simplicity and destroy any chance accusation of thrift.

Of black and gold brocade, trimmed with skunk and tasselled with gold.

I arrived at my hotel just in time to meet William, who assured me the weather was brilliant in town, and that any aspersions I cast upon it were definitely libellous. He regretted that he had to visit his aunt at five o'clock, and he wished to mention casually that he was anxious for lunch. So we lunched, and he confided to me all the things which had not really happened to him and told me of none which had; but, on the other hand, he exhibited artless anxiety to explain to me the escapades of those others, and he graciously accepted my proposition to return on Saturday and stay till Monday, when he would ask my counsel on a new view in his sentimental outlook. His horizon has had many such in my time, but yet I saw him depart regretfully, and spent my evening at the Métropole, finding the G.'s dull and unresponsive and surprised, even hurt, to realise that I do not yet play bridge.

Saturday.—Joan wrote that she had thoughts of going abroad immediately, and considered it my duty to come up and bid her farewell. I forsook William and obeyed her mandate with many a parliamentary protest at the selfishness of devoted sisters.

In the park I nearly motored over that eminent dramatist Alfred Sutro, beaming with rapt devotion at a gorgeously beautiful sheep-dog, who was wagging his no tail with responsive affection. I found Joan hesitating in her programme, and decided upon nothing more imminent than the Riviera in December. She asked my advice on the best means to avoid giving a farewell party. Hospitality is not her forte. She thinks the incursion of people for a meal disturbing to the sanctity of her hearth. She preferably entertains at restaurants. "Quite a mistake," I assured her, whilst gazing in admiration at her latest tea-gown, which should most assuredly grace the top of her well-spread, well-attended board. "You can't take that to a public room," I protested, "and why should no one see it?" It is a beautiful gown inspired and completed by a Chinese coat. Of deep blue satin is the coat, and the embroidery of the most delicate nature displays dragons and little people, wavelets and pagodas in unintelligible proximity, but making altogether for beauty. This is lined with pale yellow and mounted over an underdress of pale mauve crêpe embroidered in straw. It is a triumph of harmony, and Joan should set her speech to rhyme or music to do it justice; but she does not live in a world where such a course would be appreciated. Rashly, she once mentioned Omar before an intimate—she carefully selects these with the highest "auction" value—and he apologetically explained his ignorance with "I have forgotten my Greek." He thought she was alluding to Homer.

Monday.—Nita and I went to welcome Laurence Irving in his new play "The Unwritten Law" at the Garrick Theatre. It is a strenuous piece of work, breathing the spirit of Socialism well mixed with Anarchism, and giving much cause to think—and also to be sure—that Laurence Irving is a good actor, and graceful and impressive at that.

The house was full, and I saw Lilian, but she was not looking her best. She should moderate her transports for hair and colour. Her naturally large features were accentuated by artless art in black and red, and her head was over dressed—Pelion on Ossa, curls on coils, and a mountain before. The outlines were wrong, and her heavy chin—so definitely of the bourgeoisie—was given undue prominence. I must talk to her seriously on the subject of contours, for her frock of diaphanous black was worthy a better crown. Diana was there in a wonderful coat, its simple ingredients being an Indian shawl and a broad Russian sable stole. An admirable garment in her vicinity was of black and gold brocade with a broad collar and hems of skunk, with heavy gold tassels to assist its decorative completion. There was a pretty fair girl near me, looking particularly nice in pale pink crêpe with a golden cord round her waist and outlining her sleeves, and a little chemisette of flesh-coloured tulle across the décolletage. Mrs. F——, who has a brand new complexion, very pink and white, and some very modern hair of dark chestnut brown, graced attractively a purple ninon gown mounted over cerise and trimmed with purple bugles.

The peasants in the play managed to look entirely Russian under the influence of loose embroidered Roumanian blouses, and Laurence Irving's red shirt and blue coat added not a little to his picturesque appearance, a frivolity at which he would indignantly protest. As an active protester he is facile princeps, and recently startled our American friends by his wholesome onslaught on some of their critical methods. I wonder his wife does not follow his lead, and object violently to being dubbed "a holy terror." Thus he named her in his otherwise charming speech—and after she had histrionically proved herself such a holy consolation, too!

Nita gossiped all the way home about Christmas gifts, the unwritten law of seasonable generosity, and I dreamt of axes which shall cut plum puddings, and blood-stained cloaks to be lined with fur and presented to undeserving relations.

MRS. A.'S LETTER-BOX.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. BUT their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

PHLOX.—I hardly know how to advise you in your dilemma. So many people have tried so many things at home, and have always reported to me failure. Success, so far as I know, has never attended amateur efforts, and it is necessary to go to a first-class firm, and not only must you go once, but you must go regularly about every six weeks. Brush the hair for ten minutes every night, and use Edwards' Harlene to prevent the lustreless effect which you deplore; but do not try dyeing unless you are willing to put yourself in the best hands and pay handsomely for the privilege.

J. M. M.—I have sent your letter on to the lady who has that information, and you will doubtless hear from her direct.

COUNTRY LASS.—For ready-made clothes you cannot do better than Debenham and Freebody's, of Wigmore Street, and they issue a catalogue showing illustrations of every sort and condition of dress and coat. Charmeuse would be your best material, and for half-mourning either purple or dark grey—purple for choice. The question of collar-band must depend upon the shape of the neck. I find that in most cases a transparent collar-band is far more becoming than its omission altogether. Thank you very much for your letter. You may write again if I can be of further service to you.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

Many people choose this time of the year for having improvements made in the country cottage, in preparation for a short stay at Christmas or New Year. I have been collecting particulars of various space-saving contrivances which are specially valuable in cottages, where every inch of room is required as a rule, and it is always found by socially-minded folks who like having friends to stay with them that they are one room short. Here are a few of the inventions I have seen recently.

There is a wonderful expanding bed, which is changed from a single to a double bed in one minute, without any extra parts, the same mattress serving for both. Akin to this is a dividing bed, which makes two small or one double bed at will, the single being 3 ft. wide each and the double only 4 ft. (a riddle to the uninitiated), and the other sizes in proportion. This saves a great deal of space.

Another good idea for the bedroom is a flat box mounted on wheel castors, 4 ft. long by 2 ft. wide, and less than 1 ft. deep. It has a loose tray, and will take skirts full length, linen, etc. It dwells under the bed, and saves an enormous amount of room, or takes the place of the cupboards, which are so frequently missing from country cottages and town flats.

Then there is the problem of the bath-room, always missing from small old houses, and requiring a whole room given up to it, and even then costing much money. This difficulty is removed by a bath which folds up into a cupboard, has its own hot water supply and connections, and takes up, cupboard and all, 3 ft. by 2½ ft., and less than 6 ft. in height. Without the cupboard it takes even less, and it is fitted for no more money than an ordinary bath, without any expenses of converted room or any necessity to give up a room to it. For people less restricted in space it provides the luxury of a private bath in their own rooms at a very small cost, and it is opened as easily as one pulls down a blind.

Kitchen arrangements are made easy also. Many people turn their cottage kitchen into an extra sitting-room in the summer time, cooking being done in the scullery over a small gas-stove. The kitchen range is always the difficulty in these cases. Now, however, one can procure a pretty sitting-room open fire which turns itself into a kitchen range at the single movement of a casual hand—oven, boiler, hot-plate, hobs, flues, and all. It is cheap to start with, economical in the amount of coal used, takes four large saucepans at once, can be fitted in any room for coal or gas, and takes very little room. Yet it is not a miracle, but only a common-sense notion well carried out.

That supplementary gas-cooker in the scullery has also been reduced to a minimum of space and a maximum of capacity. One can have a little affair 10 inches deep and 9½ inches high; it includes a grill so deep as to make an admirable little oven, the gas being available on top for frying, and the very pipe which connects the gas to the grill sprouts into a little boiling burner at one side! A gas boiler, self-filling, removes the hot-water difficulty in summer, and makes it possible to do without coal fires at all, while serving more purposes than the geyser. I hear also of a new multiple cooker, in which the food cannot be reached by the steam, and two, three, or four double saucepans can be used in the stove space of one, equal heat being distributed through all, and various processes going on in each.

Who would not have a country cottage, if only for the joy of triumphing over difficulties of space and labour?

I was sighing for a convenient little hand-vacuum cleaner a week or two ago in this column. I find it exists, in a handy form and at a low price. Being thus satisfied on one count, I should not be human if I did not immediately discover further needs. Why are egg-whisks always made with a silly little handle on which a thumb and finger are badly crowded? The result is an abominable cramp, fallen eggs and limp soufflées. No human being can without a rest whip eggs from liquid to stiff froth when the only handle to the beater is a bit of wood an inch long. I want an egg-beater with a large, thick handle which can be grasped properly. Also a mincer whose reservoir and mouth are placed further forward than the clamp which fastens the machine to the table, and high enough to allow of a basin being placed under it. At present a mincer only minces on the edge of a plate, and there is no room to put a substantial vessel properly under it.

Want No. 3—an omelette and frying-pan in which the weight of the handle is balanced by a weight on the opposite side of the pan. Another handle would be inconvenient; but a weight would keep the pan flat. The average cook always burns things in the middle because the fat runs down to the handle side of the pan. Also I want milk-saucepans with a lip each side; and all these things are badly wanted on ordinary utensils, not only on very expensive ones. They all represent reasons and excuses why the Lady of the Pans should
